Governor Landon replied that it did not. There was nothing in his acceptance speech, he said, to suggest that he was in favor in any way of infringement of the right of free speech or free assembly.

The Republican Presidential nominee assured his Socialist rival that he was opposed to any such infringement and believed that workers should have the right to promote organization without interference from any one whatever, and that they should be protected in this right by the public authorities.

This, Mr. Landon added, necessarily included the right of a labor union to promote by lawful and proper means the organization of an unorganized industry with the right to send in an organizer.

Says Workers Were Protected

In explaining his action in the 1935 strike, which Major Berry, strong supporter of President Roosevelt, criticized, Governor Landon wrote that the request for troops was made by the Sheriff and prosecuting attorney of Cherokee County, that he instructed the troops to maintain order, disarm all armed civilians, including armed guards employed by the mine and smelter operators as well as those who might have been armed by labor groups.

Governor Landon added that he had forced mine and smelter guards to give up deputy constable commissions and had not permitted watchmen to carry arms off the private properties on which they were employed.

Gunmen from other States, who had made a practice of threatening striking workers, were compelled to stay out of the State, he added. The troops, he wrote, were instructed not to interfere with labor meetings or picketing, so long as they were peaceably conducted. His action, the Governor declared, protected workers in the right of free speech and free assembly.

The strike, which was in the tri-State area, the principal towns in which are Galena, Kan.; Joplin, Mo., and Pitcher, Okla., involved about 5,000 tin, zinc and lead miners and smelter workers, who alleged unfair conditions and lack of protection against the hazard of silicosis.

Receives Peace Delegation

During the day Governor Landon received a delegation of about sixty persons of the People's Mandate to Governments to End War. The delegation, composed mostly of women, was headed by Miss Mabel Vernon, campaign director of the people's mandate committee, and was introduced by Senator Arthur Capper.

The principal address was made by Mrs. C. W. Rodewald of St. Louis, State chairman of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, who said:

"The present race in armaments among the major powers will inevitably lead, as such races have in the past, to war. Armaments are not just a symptom of war; they are a major cause of war.

"A large part of our present appropriations are for weapons which are distinctly of an offensive nature, and are not for defensive purposes. The present level of arms appropriations has been reached under the guise of 'adequate national defense,' yet the United States has never fought a war which arose out of resistance to invasion.

"Republicans have declared for economy and a balanced budget. Yet these huge appropriations for armaments have been passed with the support of the Republicans.

"If you are elected to the highest office in the United States, we shall rely on you to take the leadership in securing immediate reduction in appropriation for war."

Numerous Groups Represented

Others who spoke briefly were W. E. Childress, State legislative chairman for the Brotherhod of Railroad Trainmen; Miss Fern Bauersfeld of Topeka, of the Supreme Council, Woodmen of the World; C. C. Cogswell of the Kansas State Grange, the Rev. Dr. Harold Case, pastor of the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Topeka; Dale Johnson of the St. Louis Peace Council, Mrs. C. A. Trimble of Denver, Miss Mary Moss Welborn of Starkville, Miss., and Miss Elizabeth Stradley, all of the people's mandate committee.

After the brief speeches, Miss Vernon presented an outline of the aims of the organization to the Governor, who replied:

"I thank you very much for your visit and want to congratulate you and your speakers for the presentation of your views. I am grateful to receive the material you leave with me and assure you that it will receive my consideration."

The Governor passed a comparatively quiet day with fewer political callers than usual, and worked to clean his desk of State business in preparation for another vacation with his family in Colorado before his departure about Aug. 20 on his first Eastern trip.

Among his visitors tomorrow will be Representative Chester C. Bolton, of Ohio, chairman of the Republican Congressional Committee.

Nail In Lung Gone, Boy, 3, Tours NY

Australian Lad, Operated On At Philadelphia, Romps At Rockefeller Center

Kelvin Rodgers, the 3½-year-old Australian boy who traveled 9,000 miles to have a nail removed from his lung, and his mother, Mrs. Marjorie Rodgers, were conducted on a special tour of the National Broadcasting Company studios and Rockefeller Center on July 31.

Recovered from the operation on June 25, when the nail was removed from his right lung in seven minutes in Dr. Chevalier Jackson's bronchoscopic clinic at Temple University Hospital, Philadelphia, the boy scampered and frolicked during the tour, says the New York Times, whose report of July 31 continues: Showing an exceptional interest in mechanisms, he found time during his play to ask many questions.

The microphone in the studios was a familiar object because early in the month he had said "Hello, Daddy!" into one in a short wave broadcast to his father in Melbourne, and had heard his father's voice.

Going 'to See His Daddy'

Now he was going "down under," to see his father again, and at the sight of every microphone his blue eyes would sparkle. "I'm going to see my daddy," he would say, and then prance around on the softcarpeted floors, try to stand on his head and turn somersaults.

Tomorrow, with his mother, he will start the journey home on the motor ship Jeff Davis of the American Pioneer Line, which brought him here. Idolized by the members of the crew, who have gifts for him, including a small motor car, the boy is just as anxious to see them again.

"I want to see 'Okey Dokey,'" he kept saying during the tour, whenever menton was made of the fifty-six-day voyage before him. "Okey Dokey," it was explained, is his nickname for one of the seamen on the freighter.

Kelvin and his mother came by automobile from Philadelphia, arriving here at noon. They were accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. James F. McCrudden, Miss Evelyn Hersey of the International Institute and Mrs. Victor Karner, all of Philadelphia. Mrs. Karner has entertained the boy and his mohter at her home since the operation.

He Applauds All Acts

The party early in the afternoon occupied an executive box near the projection room, on the sixth floor, at the Radio City Music Hall. Fatigued by the drive from Philadelphia, the boy slept in Mr. McCrudden's arms until the revue came on. Then he became wide awake. He applauded all the acts.

Seeing a model of the China Clipper plane on the desk of John H. Hartley, in the NBC studios, he asked for a key to wind up the plane "to make it go."

When he was asked what he was going to be when he grew up, he replied: "A doctor." Here the mother explained that Dr. Jackson had told Kelvin that if he came back to America when he was 20 years old he would send him to a medical school.

After several hours of fun the boy ate a hearty dinner in one of the RCA Building restaurants. At 8 p.m. he was put to bed in the private apartment in Madison Avenue where the party is staying. The remainder of the party heard a 9 p.m. broadcast.

Today Kelvin will be taken to a pottery in Inwood, and will be shown how to make playthings out of clay. He has gained two pounds since the operation, now tipping the scales at 37.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Cook's Thirteen Operas

Pierre Alexander Monsigny (1729-1817), was a cook and majordomo in the house of the Duke of Orleans, when he witnessed a performance in a French opera house in 1759. He immediately resigned his position, announcing his determination to write 13 operas, no more, no less. He devoted 12 years (1759-1771) to the composition of 13 operas, which were all performed and enjoyed colossal popularity. The most popular, "The Deserter," is still in the repertoire of the French Opera. But after his quota was filled, he went back to the kitchen, in 1771, and never wrote another word until his death 46 years later.

Monsigny is considered one of the fathers of French opera.

250-Km. Rail Line To Connect Tientsin With Southern Hopei

Domei

PEIPING, August 25—Marking the first stage of the much-heralded joint economic exploitation of North China, a new railway linking Shihchiachwang in southern Hopei with Tientsin, approximately 250 kilometers in length, will be constructed shortly by the Hopei-Chahar Political Council, it was reliably revealed here today.

The new railway construction program is reported to have been calculated to provide the districts with "an economic trunk line" connecting the material-producing district in southern Hopei with the greatest seaport in the North. Following its completion, the new railway, will, it is further pointed out, furnish great facilities for the transportation of coal from Shansi and cotton from Hopei.

The plans for the railway are understood to have been greatly accelerated by the recent negotiations between the Japanese Ambassador to China, Mr. Shigeru Kawagoye, and General Sung Che-yuan, chairman of the Hopei-Chahar Political Council. As a result of the arrangements between the Japanese and Chinese authorities, the North China economic program is expected to take definite shape in the near future, extending over various fields of the local administration.

Spain's Struggle To Hold Middle Course Defeated

centration camps. The latter expected from the republic equally far-reaching measures, but of the opposite kind: government control of industries, wage-raising, redistribution of the land, rehabilitation and security projects.

But the Men of the Republic represented mixed loyalties. They were pulled in both directions, and as a result the pendulum swung for two years between measures aimed at the old ruling classes and measures of repression aimed at the mass of peasants and workers.

The swings, in turn, were determined by pressures exerted from Right and Left. The Right, which had no reason to feel it could trust a government in which there were Socialist Cabinet Ministers, froze its credits, slowed up its financial and manufacturing activities still more, paralyzed its agricultural work as much as it could, and began to employ groups of armed men to harass the Left and endanger the government.

Army Revolt Beaten

A year and a half after April 1931, the Right concentrated its effort on a military revolt, which occurred in the Summer of 1932 and was promptly defeated, chiefly by civilian participation on the government side.

Meanwhile, on the Left, the situation of peasants and workers had not been perceptibly bettered. Growing uneasiness and dissatisfaction began to show in strikes, invasions of estates, bombings, burnings of crops. At the beginning of 1933 there was an uprising, mainly of peasants, which was put down so firmly that the government at once began to lose peasant and worker support. In that year (1933) the Socialists, pushed from Right and Left, withdrew from the Cabinet and the government was taken over by Republicans more or less closely allied with the Right, and more or less committed to its methods of economic salvation.

The result was chronic uproar, an uprising almost immediately, hundreds of strikes, and finally a nation-wide peasant strike. All of which, combined with the discovery of scandals as sensational as Teapot Dome and the Stavisky case, ended the life of that government and closed chapter two of the story of the republic.

Chapter three began with the attempt on the part of these rulers to hand the power over to the extreme Right, represented by Fascists, such as Gil Robles, who called themselves Republicans. This meant a still further swing and an open commitment to Fascist measures of reform and control: a farewell to democracy, with life shaped to the German and Austrian patterns. The attempt, made in the Fall of 1934, had been preceded and illustrated by the collapse of the German Republic and the battles of Fascists and Socialists in Vienna, which had made a profound impression on the common people of Spain.

For that reason mainly, the divided sectors of trades unions and labor parties had begun to come together, and chapter three of the story therefore opened with civil war. When Gil Robles was called to the Cabinet, there was a national strike, with uprisings which took several weeks to repress. The spearhead of revolt and repression was in Asturias. Here the miners, organized in united-front labor committees, took over the entire region and were dislodged only after the rest of Spain had been recaptured, and only with the use of Spain's Foreign Legion and Moorish mercenaries, a method unparalleled in the entire history of Spain.

Left Confident

This clash gave the Left confidence and sent the pendulum swinging back. At the beginning of this year, the Left, though sore, outraged, indignant and suffering from a terrific defeat, had come together; and after a year and a quarter of strikes, martial law, street skirmishes and undercover reorganization, labor forced elections and swept the Right from power. And again, as in 1931, the masses called in the Men of the Republic.

Thus was born the Popular Front, which in fact was the same alignment as there was in 1931, except that this time there were no labor participants in the Cabinet, and most labor organizations were not enthusiastic supporters of the Republican regime. The paradox of a Republican government created by labor and resting on labor, yet exercising power not in the name of labor, was repeated, more sharply untenable than before.

The phenomenon of "dual power," that appeared in Russia during the time of Kerensky, began to make life miserable for the Men of the Republic and for the labor leaders who urged and advocated the Popular Front. This phenomenon, translated into constant struggle within every peasant and worker organization, between those who advocate taking the power directly and those who advocate letting the Republicans administer it, is the keynote of chapter four of the story of Spain's republic, which is now drawing to an end.

In the four months of its life the Popular Front government has been completely paralyzed by this struggle, and by the knowledge that the real power lodges in union headquarters. Demands from Right and Left that it take drastic measures against the other to remedy the intolerable state of economic distress have been met by small postponements, little swings repeating the swings of the first days of the republic. There has been constant battling in the streets between the armed Right and the armed Left; there have been strikes at the rate of two or three new ones a day, sometimes supported, sometimes repressed, most often ignored; political murders, and open plotting in all the armed forces of the State.

Revolt Openly Predicted

The fever-chart climbed steadily and for many weeks before July 19 it was apparent, and openly stated in most of the press, that an upheaval, provoked by a military-Fascist putsch, was imminent. Yet the government, pulled Right by the fear of Socialist revolution, pulled Left by the fear of fascism, did as in 1931: it made strong speeches and drifted.

And now the decisive battle has begun. It has been rehearsed on a larger and larger scale, since the fall of the monarchy and its dictatorship. Each side now knows with blinding clarity the extent of its strength, the nature of what is involved, and what will happen to it if it losses.

Each side also knows all the moves; each has fought in the streets many times before and each knows that it wins or loses according as it has the support of the common people, the great majorities of the land.

From its own history and from events in other European countries, all Spain now knows that it is launched definitively on one of two roads: fascism or socialism. It knows that the struggle to decide which is not just a question of who wins today's battles. It is something that will take months, possibly years, to decide; and the outcome depends on money as well as on arms—and almost as much on the millions of people who are not Spaniards as on the Spaniards themselves.

Social and Personal Notes

One of the most interesting and important exhibitions at the opening of the art season is that of leading Japanese oil painters at the Matsuzakaya department store at Ueno park. It opened today and will continue to September 5. Among the famous Japanese artists whose work is being shown are Takeji Fujishima, Eisaku Wada, and Saburosuke Okada. Mr. Paul Jacoulet, a French color print artist in Tokyo, is also showing some of his work at the exhibition, having been asked by the oil painters to join in their display. It is understood that this is the first time these painters have included a foreign artist in their exhibitions. The photograph above is of "The Korean Salt Merchant," one of the prints Mr. Jacoulet is showing at the exhibit.

ROOF GARDEN MOVIES

The motion picture program at the roof garden of the Imperial Hotel this evening includes "Queen Christina" with Greta Garbo, John Gilbert, and Lewis Stone and several shorts, "Two Barks Brothers," "What Price Jazz," and "Tale of the Vienna Wood."

Auto Plants Pay Higher Wages Than In 1934

ment in Detroit for about 1750 workers.

In mentioning the new plants, the trailer industry is mushrooming at the heels of the automobile industry. Almost every trailer plant in the United States is expanding and hiring more men. Many of the companies have reported that they are unable to keep up with the demand although working to capacity.

Expect Good Winter Trade

They look to little decline in their business as winter approaches, for their past experience has shown that those are the months that many motorists buy their trailers, hook them onto their cars and move to the expanding trailer towns of the South and Southwest.

It is believed that at this fall's auto shows the trailer makers, if they can spare a house-on-wheels or two, will be showing jointly with the automobile manufacturers.

As a whole, the industry seems satisfied with its plan for the elimination of wide fluctuations of employment in the motor assembly plants by bringing out its new models in the fall rather than January.

Announce Good Results

After six months of the 1936 model production the A. M. A. reported that in contrast to the large swings in employment in previous years, the industry reduced the maximum variation of employment from November through April to less than 20,000 men from the highest to the lowest point. During those six months, it was announced, these results showed:

Average earnings of more than 350,000 workers moved to a new high for recent years; proportion of temperary jobs reduced; plant efficiency increased; labor turnover reduced; factory accident rates curtailed.

Meanwhile, the United Automobile Workers' Union reports rapid growth recently. Since the convention of the union at South Bend, Ind., on May 2, membership has grown from 40,000 to better than 90,000, according to Richard T. Frankensteen, who is directing unionization here.

An Amazing Growth

"It has been an amazing growth for nine weeks," he said, "but within a few months after the opening of the new production season we expect to double that figure."

He added all locals were reporting gains and that where the union a year ago could only claim a membership of one eighth of the automotive workers it now was nearly a fifth. The 90,000 figure, Mr. Frankensteen said, includes the gains made when the Automotive Industrial Workers' Association, the largest independent union in the industry, the Associated Automobile Workers and local Mechanics Educational Society of American amalgamated with the American Federation of Labor affiliate.

At the present time the union is carrying on a drive with the backing of John L. Lewis' Committee for Industrial Organization. Sectional mass meetings are being held and the attendance at recent meetings is between 700 and 10,000. Three radio broadcasts are given each week. Mr. Frankensteen said he thought the groundwork had been laid for further, rapid growth.

One of the immediate goals of the union is a $2000 annual wage for workers in the automobile plants. "General Motors," he said, "could have paid every worker $2000 last year and still made approximately $79,000,000."

Soviet Military Attache Is Arrested At Moscow

Domei

LONDON, August 27—Reports from Moscow announcing that General V. Poutna, military attache to the Soviet Embassy at London, has been arrested in the Soviet capital caused a considerable sensation here today.

According to reports published by the Evening News, the general was summoned by the Moscow authorities two days ago under the pretext that his presence at a military conference at Moscow is urgently required. The paper reveals that two members of the O. G. P. U. have recently searched all private correspondence and various other documents of the staff of the Soviet Embassy.

The journal believes that General Poutna will probably be charged with leakage of military information. It adds that Soviet agents have recently tried to obtain information from Russian emigres at London as to whether the general has received visitors from the Continents.

$3,500,000,000 Is Held To Be 'Democrat' Fund

Deal's campaign fund," the circular said.

The Democratic party, according to the circular, has retained the traditional label but has renounced its traditional principles in favor of "a philosophy which means death to American form of government."

Calling for a crusade to preserve "American" government, the committee declared that "only an adequately financed Republican party can fight a winning campaign." "If you think giving money is disagreeable," the circular declared, "remember that it is not nearly so disagreeable or dangerous as four more years of Roosevelt."

How Funds Will Be Used

The appeal for funds declared that contributions would be used for a united campaign to elect the national, State, country, Congressional and Senatorial tickets. The money is needed for radio time, publicity bureaus, advertising, printing, speakers' bureaus, special divisions, tour expenses of candidates and campaign leaders and general organization costs in about 120,000 precincts throughout the nation.

Prospective contributors were urged to give generously, fearlessly and quickly. The Republican National Finance Committee for New York City has headquarters at 41 East Forty-second Street. It is headed by Robert H. Thayer. It will work in conjunction with the United Republican Finance Committee for New York State, of which Charles A. Blackwell is chairman. In the five boroughs of New York City the two committees wil conduct a joint drive to sell "participation certificates," to be turned over to contributors to the campaign fund. These certificates will be sold in every country of the State.

Contribution, however, may be made direct instead of by purchase of certificates. Each certificate, bearing engravings of Abraham Lincoln and George Washington, declares that the holder "is a participant in the work of bringing about a return to the fundamental principles of our government."

Coughlin Regards Landon As Menace

Says If Governor Should Win And Adopt Hoover Policy, A Rebellion Would Follow

The Rev. Charles E. Coughlin, ridiculing reports that his church might silence him, pointed to his "Roman collar" August 1 at Worcester, Mass. and declared it was not "in the moth balls."

Though not referring specifically to the visit during that week of Bishop Gallagher of Detroit with Pope Pius, Father Coughlin declared:

"By all prognostications and prophecies printed in the papers in the last two weeks my Roman collar by this time was supposed to be in the custody of moth balls."

At another point in his address to an outdoor rally which nearly 10,000 attended, according to a police estimate, he asserted that "newspaper headlines were having me silenced while I was laughing at them," accoring to the New York Times.

At the same time he said that, if President Roosevelt "had not spent money in alleviating the poverty and the misery of the poeple, there would have been bloodshed in the streets, as in France and as in Spain today."

He also said that, if Herbert Hoover had been re-elected President and if Governor Landon should "take up where Hoover left off there would be nothing left for America but bloody revolution."

To the gathering, sponsored by the National Union for Social Justice, Father Coughlin asserted:

"No member of the National Union will vote for either Mr. Roosevelt or Mr. Landon."

Of his political plans he said:

"We are trying to recall and retrieve the greatness of both the [major] parties. Irrespective of party affiliation, we'll support the candidate if he'll support our sixteen principles or die in the attempt."

WPA Idling Hit

After pointing to a WPA relief project in Detroit where "one man in ten is working, and if the other nine raised their picks they would commit murder," Father Coughlin asserted of the Administration Relief work:

"While they are expending all kinds of bogus, borrowed money and teaching men now not to work, even the WPA men are recognizing that Santa Claus is going to die of old age one of these days.

"After Roosevelt, what?

"It will not be the National Union for Social Justice. We have never been a political party. But we are going to be the whip, the courage. We are going to be the very dynamite that blows these politicians and 'banker-patriots' out of American life."

President Roosevelt, Father Coughlin said, had borrowed "eighteen billions from the bankers, but the trouble was that the bankers did not have the money. They just gave him a rubber check. And in return he gave them eighteen billions of bonds.

"That means that for 36,000,000,000 hours, at 50 cents an hour, you will have to follow your trade to pay back that rubber bankers' check."

Both major political parties, he asserted, had been under the domination of "international bankers" for years.

"What is political freedom?" he asked. "What is it to be free citizens if unseen hands and powers choose your candidates and conduct your campaigns? Ten years ago we did not know how to combine against the ward-heeler and political committee, but today we have amalgamated and victory shall be ours."

Newspapers Denounced

Turning to attack newspapers, which he asserted were under the domination of advertisers, industry and bankers, Father Coughlin shouted:

"We don't need the support of newspapers and we don't want it.

"I have one axiom to guide you in the campaign: The candidate whom the newspapers support, mark him well, but don't mark his ballot."

The crowd broke in with cheers and cried, "give it to 'em Father."

"The day of the newspaper's ascendancy in unholy wedlock with rotten politicians is ended," he declared.

Father Coughlin asserted that Governor Landon, the Republican Presidential nominee, was named by William Randolph Hearst, who, the speaker said, was more powerful than all the newspapers in America."

As a result of American farm relief problems, he declared, "our production of wheat next year will be short about 100,000,000 bushels. Whom can we buy it from? We may be forced to ask communistic wheat for the bread on our table. Do we want that?"

Father Coughlin asserted that the National Union had 140 units in Massachusetts already.

"I want 3,200 units in Massachusetts, each 250 strong, by Nov. 3, and they won't need to count the ballots," he shouted.

After the address, for which hundreds waited more than three hours under a cloudless sky, Father Coughlin left for Waterbury, Conn., to confer with district leaders. Tomorrow he will speak at East Providence, R. I., and New Bedford.

Dr. Alfred N. Kelly, 51, of St. Louis, dropped dead of heart disease while on his way to the rally. He was filling an engagement at the Pentecostal Church here.

Coughlin Assailed

Dr. Walter A. Maier of the faculty at Concordia Lutheran Theological Seminary, St. Louis, charged in an attack on the Rev. Charles E. Coughlin that "the voice behind that radio priest is the voice of his church."

Speaking at the annual Lutheran Day ceremony, attended by 4,500 persons, Dr. Maier said Bishop Michael J. Gallagher of Detroit was "solidly behind" Father Coughlin.

"Here is a priest, ripping off his Roman collar to scream out clerical endorsement of a puppet candidate," he declared. "Don't tell me that this clerical demagogue at Royal Oak is repudiated by his own church. He talks personally with Rome by radio phone, and his Bishop, his ecclesiastical superior, is solidly behind him.

Discerns Voice of Church

"Has the Vatican ever disavowed him? If ever Coughlinism should triumph, which God in His mercy may prevent, his church would capitalize the triumph, for the voice behind that radio priest is the voice of his church.

"Don't tell me that this chameleon cleric at the Shrine of the Little Flower does not now use his position and influence for the benefit of his creed and its system. We have evidence that he does, and that he represents an unholy combination which admittedly would have the canons of the church shape the political life of the nation."

Soviet Study Rule Praised By Labor

Union Organ Says New Decree On Colleges Will End The Existing Confusion

Further details of the recent decree issued by the Council of People's Commissars and the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union revising the system of instruction in some 600 institutions of higher education attended by approximately half a million young men and women are found in Trud, the official central organ of the Russian labor unions The paper begins by qualifying the new ukase, according to the New York Times, as follows:

"It puts an end to the muddle and confusion which have, until now, accompanied educational work in the higher schools. Not a single detail of the varied and complex structure of higher education has been omitted. The order, forms, and methods of study and the practical work of the students have been provided for. The duties of the students and of the teaching staff, and the method of transferring from one higher school to another, have been defined precisely, and, finally, new regulations for graduation of students from the higher schools have been established."

Higher Education Free

"All citizens of the Soviet Union, men and women from 17 to 35 years of age, who have graduated from a complete secondary school and have passed entrance examinations for a higher school, have the right to enter such higher schools," the decision begins. It thus establishes by law the principle of free higher education, a principle already existing in practice and in harmony with the draft of the new Constitution, which guarantees all Soviet citizens the right to education. (The age limitations do not refer to persons studying outside the school, who may also get permission to take the examinations.)

Among the subjects in which entrance examinations must be taken (except in the case of students who finished the secondary schools with "excellent" in the basic subjects and not lower than "satisfactory" in all others, and who are therefore admitted to the universities, institutes, &c., without taking examinations), are Russian, literature, political education, mathematics, physics, chemistry and, beginning next year, a foreign language—English, French or German.

Study begins in the higher schools Sept. 1, and ends June 30, with a Winter vacation from Jan. 24 to Feb. 6. For the third, fourth and fifth terms, where practical training in production can be carried on only during the Summer months, the school term begins Nov. 1.

The close connection now maintained between theory and practice will continue by reason of the fact that the higher schools will remain under the management of the various People's Commissariats. Contact maintained between the higher schools and enterprises by systematically acquainting professors with the latest technical developments in industry and agriculture and by recruiting the best-qualified graduates for teaching in the higher schools, will enable the commissariats to closely direct the training of personnel.

Beginning with the next school term, no more than thirty hours of classes are to be given in the six-day week for first and second year students; no more than twenty-four hours for third and fourth year students, and no more than eighteen hours for fifth year students. In addition to the regular rest day each week, students of the third and fourth terms are to have one additional day, and those in the fifth term two additional days, for independent work.

Subjects Strictly Limited

The number of subjects per semester must not exceed six; the number per day must not exceed three. All students must take examinations on the complete course of each subject included in the curriculum and must also report on their practical work, after they have completed the entire course. Grades to be used in the higher schools are unsatisfactory, satisfactory and excellent. State examinations and the presentation of theses for graduation are to take place annually during the months of June and October.

There will be two types of diplomas. To students graduating with grades of "excellent" in at least three-fourths of all their subjects, "satisfactory" in the rest, and a grade of "excellent" for all State examinations or graduation theses, diplomas of the first category will be granted. All other graduates will receive diplomas of the second category. In their practical work students are to perform the entire cycle of the basic work in their specialty.

Study Discloses Buying Upturn In Philadelphia

Reveals Almost Normal Conditions, With 37 Average Age Of Home Purchaser

A decided upswing in economic conditions in the Philadelphia area is reported by Clark & Kniskern Inc., Philadelphia realtors, as a result of a survey just completed of home buying in Philadelphia during the first half of the current year, according to the New York Herald Tribune.

"It is significant to note," reports the research department of the company, "that at the very peak of the Coolidge boom in 1929, the age of the average home buyer in Philadelphia was thirty-five. Today we find almost normal conditions existing with the average home buyer's age at thirty-seven. Our study showed a large number of sales of homes in the $20,000 field during the first six months of 1936. Here, also, we found the normal age group—that between forty-five and fifty years ago.

"More vital, however, is the unusually large number of home buyers we found in the age group under thirty. This group accounted for close to 11 per cent of the total number of home buyers. One was only twenty-four years of age. One-fourth of all the home purchasers this year were under thirty-five years of age and 60 per cent were under age of forty."

The survey revealed that the average price paid for a home was $4,790.50. It showed that 57 per cent of the home buyers preferred either semi-detached or detached homes and that 85 per cent wanted a small house of five or six rooms, with the latter sized dwelling being preferred by two-third of the purchasers. The trend to the suburban areas was not as decided as it had been, only 55 per cent selecting homes in the suburbs.

The report disclosed some decidedly interesting facts regarding the various age groups. It showed that only the group between forty and fifty was interested in dwellings larger than six rooms; that a decided preference for the suburbs was indicated in the forty to forty-five-year age group, was a swing back to the city beginning with age forty-five.

Age Facts Tabulated

Bracketing the various classes, the report gave the folowing facts regarding the various age groups:

Age thirty and under—A semi-detached suburban home of five or six rooms at an average price of $3,600.

Age thirty to thirty-five—Evenly divided between city and suburban semi-detached homes of six rooms and bath, with average price $4,300.

Age thirty-five to forty—Sixty per cent prefer six-room, row, brick house in city with other 40 per cent desiring semi-detached five or six-room homes in suburbs. Average price, $4,100.

Age forty to forty-five—Eighty-five per cent select homes in suburbs, with one-third desiring single suburban homes with more than six rooms. Average price, $5,550.

Age forty-five to fifty—Sixty-five per cent prefer the suburbs. Seventy-five per cent a six-room house. Average price of home, $6,250.

Age fifty and over—Ninety per cent prefer six-room house. Equally divided as to city and suburbs. Average home price, $5,725.

In commenting on the report, William A. Clarke, president of Clarke & Kniskern, Inc., said that the figures presented an encouraging picture for Philadelphia, especially when they were compared with those of the nation as a whole recently presented by the United States Building and Loan League for the first half of the year. He pointed out that the league's statistics showed that the average age of home owners whose mortgages are held by savings, building and loan associations was between forty-five and fifty years, that there are about twice as many borrowers between forty and forty-five years of age as there are between thirty and thirty-five years, and that there are many more in the age group between fifty and sixty than there are today between thirty and forty.

Demand For Homes Shown

"We consider that our figures show that there are just as many new home buyers between thirty and thirty-five years as there are between forty and forty-five, and close to five times as many in the age group between thirty and forty as there are today between fifty and sixty," Mr. Clarke said, "we are forced to accept the premise that business conditions in this area are showing a decided improvement and that the increased demand for homes is decidedly with us.

"A study of the report brings out emphatically that the youths, who found it almost impossible to obtain employment during the depression, not only are finding work at good salaries, but are getting married as well. We find, too, an increase in marriages, many of which were postponed during recent years because of bad economic conditions. The figures also show that the doubling up of families, brought about by the depressions, is rapidly disappearing These are unusually bright pictures, showing that we are out of the rough, almost back to normal (if we are not there already), and most decidely on the road to the greatest and sanest period of prosperity we have ever known.

"The survey shows that by far the greatest number of new home purchasers the first half of this year was in the age group between thirty-five and forty. For this the payment of the soldiers' bonus is largely responsible. Instead of spending this money foolishly, the average war veteran is investing it wisely. Many of them used their bonds to buy homes.

"Perhaps the most gratifying fact is the unusually large number of young men who are buying homes. The number is greater than usual and indicates that our new generation is far wiser than the one which preceded it. In the past, young couples generally purchased an automobile before thinking of buying a home. Today it appears that it is the other way around. It is a sound sign and it indicates clearly that any fears we may have as to the future of our country are groundless"

Standley Says US Plans Battleships To Match Britain's

Thinks Two Will Be Laid Down As London Announces It Has Already Let Contracts

The announcement by Sir Samuel Hoare that Britain would lay the keels for two new battleships early next year drew from the Acting Secretary of the Navy, Admiral William H. Standley, recently at Washington, D. C., the comment that "actual laying of the keels won't concern us until next Jan. 1."

Admiral Standley said that preliminary plans were being completed for two new battleships, and he admitted that he would discuss construction of these two vessels with President Roosevelt upon his return to the White House, according to the New York Times, whose report follows:

He declined to reveal how far the plans had progressed, but indicated that they were so near completion that bids could be asked during the calendar year. The London naval treaty prohibits laying of new keels prior to next Jan. 1.

"There is no reason we cannot proceed with certain preliminaries, however," Admiral Standley said, adding that the British had "announced what they would do last Winter."

Asked whether he thought the United States would build two new battleships to keep pace with Britain, the admiral replied:

"There is no doubt in my mind that two ships will be built."

Under the provisions of the last Naval Appropriation Bill, the United States was authorized to begin construction of the new ships when the President found that any other treaty nation had commenced construction of the same number of ships.

The limitation of 35,000 tons will be respected, Admiral Standley said, and the only other restriction will be the size of the guns to be installed. If Great Britain equips the new ships with fourteen-inch guns, the United States will do likewise just as it will follow if the foreign ships are armed with sixteen-inch guns.

"We haven't built a battleship in fifteen years," Admiral Standley replied to a question, "so naturally there will be changes in armor, speed and other details."

Britain Lets Contracts

The award of contracts for two new British battleships was announced recently in the House of Commons by Sir Samuel Hoare, First Lord of the Admiralty.

The contract for one ship goes to the Vickers-Armstrongs Company at Walker-on-Tyne and the other to the Cammel-Laird Company at Birkenhead.

Both keels will be laid next January, which is the earliest possible date under the terms of the old Washington naval treaty.

The specifications will not be ready before October and the price is not yet fixed. Awarding of contracts before plans and costs are fully determined is a departure from the usual practice, but it is necessary in order to allow the builders to get ready to begin work in January.

Presumably, the new craft will be of 35,000 tons each, or a trifle less, like the Nelson and the Rodney, but as those ships were laid down fourteen years ago it is expected that there will be variations from their type.

The builders already know enough about the plans for making their preparations.

Speed Is Reply to Tories

The announcement of the contracts was timely, for two reasons. It brings comfort to workers in the Tyne and Mersey areas, who were bitterly disappointed when it was learned that the sister ship to the Queen Mary was to be built on the Clyde. It also serves as a partial antidote to the complaint of Tories that the government is not arming fast enough.

It was for the same reason that Alfred Duff Cooper, the Secretary of War, told recently of a proposed addition of 17,000 men to the infantry reserve. Soon the Air Minister will announce a big increase in the number of reserve pilots for the air force.

A deputation of Members of Parliament, led by Winston Churchill, who are complaining of slowness in rearming, had their second private talk with Prime Minister Stanley Baldwin, who told them he would consider carefully what they had told him about the war preparations of other countries.

In making his statement to Parliament concerning the new battleships, Sir Samuel Hoare said:

"The arrangements for laying made in full accordance with the declared policy of His Majesty's Government to press on with naval replacement and the new construction program with all possible speed." Sir Samuel added that it appeared that the design of the ships would be affected by the report of the Minister of Coordination of Defense on his inquiry into the vulnerability of capital ships to aerial attacks.

$5,000,000,000 Invested In American Business Firms By Outside Nations

Once a year Uncle Sam goes over his foreign accounts.

The amiable gentleman with the chin whiskers checks the cash ledgers to see how his balance stands with his friend and relative John Bull; his Canadian and Mexican neighbors; that nice Marianne, the French lady; with Herr Schmidt, the German, and all the other countries and peoples of the world.

It is one of the most remarkable balance sheets put together. It comes once a year with a supplementary report every six months. Technically it is called "the balance of international payments of the United States in 1935." Actually it is just an account book.

Money Spent Abroad

It shows how much money the world has invested in American business concerns ($5,000,000,000); and how much Americans invested abroad ($12,630,000,000); it shows outgo and income of exports and imports; it shows what American tourists spent abroad last year, and where they spent it; it shows how charitable gifts went abroad and played their part in the balance of trade, along with immigrant remittances; it shows how Uncle Sam's exports to his two best customers, John Bull and Miss Canada jumped ahead last year (13.2 per cent and 6.9 per cent, respectively), while shipments to the Chinese gentleman at the other end of the world declined 44 per cent.

It shows, too, that Uncle Sam increased his purchases tremendously from his best customers (United Kingdom 34.6 per cent; Canada 23.6 per cent; Japan 28.2 per cent). Uncle Sam noted that imports from China jumped 45 per cent, at the same time that exports fell off 44 per cent. "That boy Franklin certainly is playing hob with his Chinese silver policy!" he was heard to remark.

The balance sheet shows that Uncle Sam is selling more goods abroad than he buys, and that he is getting a larger sum from his foreign customers on money he has lent them or invested abroad, according to the Christian Science Monitor

In the balance between exports and imports of merchandise, the latest report for the fiscal year 1935 just closed shows a net credit to the United States of $236,000,000, as against a net credit of $478,000,000 last year.

Trade Gap Closing

For a number of years this gap between exports and imports has been growing smaller, with all sorts of international implications involved, chief of which seems to be that foreign countries won't buy from the United States unless the United States buys from them

This matter seems even more important in the big credit which the balance sheet shows in interest and dividends coming to Americans from money loaned or invested abroad. A year ago this return was $367,000,000; this year it has increased to $375,000,000.

The matter is not discussed in the Government's report but economists wonder how the world is going to repay its debts to the United States if insuperable tariff barriers are put in the way. It is part of Cordell Hull's policy to make mutual tariff concessions that will facilitate international trade. At one point the report states:

"The modification of trade restrictions in some foreign countries, and the stimulus given to our export trade with certain others as a result of reciprocal trade agreements, also exerted a favorable influence."

Puting it as a whole, United States merchandise exports of $2,283,000,000 in 1935 represented a total value 7 per cent in excess of 1934.

Imports Up 24 Per cent

Imports reached $2,047,000,000 in value, or 24 per cent more than in 1934.

The American tourist, the balance sheet reveals, is helping to keep world trade a two-way affair. Foreign tourists spent $117,000,000 in the United States last year, but Americans spent $409,000,000 abroad, a debit balance of $292,000,000.

Half of America's tourist expenditures were made in border countries—Canada got $192,000,000 (visiting Canadians spent about $63,000,000,) Mexico about $34,000,000 (visiting Mexicans spent about $5,000,000.)

America's tourist expenditures in 1935 are another sign of reviving prosperity. Giving the figure in millions, here are the estimated expenditures for a number of years:

1929	821
1930	762
1931	563
1932	446
1933	292
1934	331
1935	409

Expenses Analyzed

The Commerce Department has done a remarkable job in breaking down the expenditures of the average first, cabin, second, tourist and third-class passengers on their European trips, and figuring out which country they visit, how much they spend, and how long they stop.

For example, a first-class American passenger averages $1261 expenses all told, putting $514 into his ship expenses, and $747 on shore, while a third-class passenger average only $406, of which $196 goes to the ship and $220 on shore. The third-class passenger, oddly enough, stays a little longer when he gets there, 57 days, as against 41 for the first-class passenger, but he works on a shoestring of only $3.86 a day, while Mr. First Class spends $18.22 a day.

Businessmen To Confer With Brazilian Mission

Taking advantage of the projected visit to this country of a Brazilian economic mission, Japanese traders concerned are to hold a Japanese-Brazilian trade conference with the delegates. This was decided on at a meeting of Government officials and representative traders, held at the Foreign Office on Tuesday.

The proposed conference will be held, it has been decided, at the office of the Tokyo Chamber of Commerce and Industry, on September 22, 24 and 28. At Tuesday's conference, a discussion was made also on the methods of contact between the mission and Japanese traders, and on the choice of factories and equipments to be shown the mission.

Reich Military Law Ascribed To Tense Situation

Held As Reinforcement Of Protection Against Bolshevism

Domei

BERLIN, August 25—Details of yesterday's decree by Reichsfuehrer Adolf Hitler extending the military service from one to two years were announced today by General Werner von Blombe.g, Re chsminister of War.

All volunteers of the class born in 1913 or in previous years who enlisted last autumn will be honorably discharged from service at the end of autumn while all recruits of the class of 1914 and subsequent years who enlisted last autumn will be required to stay an additional year, it was announced.

Meanwhile, the Diplomatische Korrespondenz, semi-official publication here, asserted that the prolongation of the term of military service was necessary in view of the delicate situation in Europe in which "Germany could no longer remain indolent in front of increasing international armament race."

The newest German move is described as a natural consequence of the condition in the countries surrounding Germany.

German Move Hailed

Domei

VIENNA, August 25—That the reinforcement of the regular German Army is tantamount to the reinforcement of protection against Bolshevism and is therefore a guarantee of peace, is expressed by the Neuigtkeits-Weltblatt, Catholic organ of Chancellor Kurt Schuschnigg, here today.

The fact that the German government definitely has agreed to the collective neutrality accord concerning Spain as well as prohibiting the exports of arms to Spain and at the same time decreeing an extension of military service shows that Germany wants to be strong and pacific, the journal concludes.

Italy Hails Reich Move

Domei

ROME, August 25—Strongly expressing themselves in favor of the German Government's decision to extend by one year the term of military service as decreed yesterday, all the leading papers here today declared unanimously that the Reich's steps designed to strengthen its military strength is a natural consequence of the Soviet Union's increase in its armed forces by lowering the conscription age.

The Stampa declares that the German decision to double the term of military service will constitute a stern warning to Moscow "in view of Moscow's recent provocative acts."

The Corriere della Sera stressed that the entire German press was unanimous in pointing out that Soviet Russia's increased armed strength and also its intensified activities aimed at world revolution have necessitated Berlin to decide upon the step.

To Summon Reichstag

Domei

BERLIN, August 25—Chancellor Adolf Hitler will summon the Reichstag at Nuremberg during the Nazi party congress which is to be held during September 8 and 14, it was reliably reported here today. It is understood that the chief item on the agenda of the Reichstag session, is the passage of laws dealing with future German youths, who it is expected, will be mobilized for state service along the lines of the Italian Balilla.

Ignorance Of Neighbors Realized In Philippines

fairs with such distinguished visitors as Tang Leang-li, Editor of the Peoples Tribune of Shanghai, a leading Nationalist paper in China; Jack Foster, of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers; and Yasotarro Morri and Ken Sato of the Osaka Mainichi. No more thorough presentation of Japanese polices was ever heard by the Association than that of Mr. Sato at a dinner in his honor on July 29.

It is also the hope of leading members of the Association that similar organizations will be formed by leaders of thought in other Oriental countries so that some time in the future, the delegates of all Orientalist societies throughout the Far East may meet in conference with a view to frankly exchanging impressions and opinions on their common problems, along the style of the Institute of Pacific Relations. It is their belief that only by the increase of knowledge of each other's problems will mutual sympathy rule the consideration of questions arising between the different peoples of the Orient and that only mutual regard for each other's rights and legitimate aspirations will peace and progress be assured.

Since its foundation, much sympathy has already been shown by prominent leaders and different organizations in other Oriental countries. Communications have been exchanged with them and close cooperation is being worked out for the regular exchange of information and data. For instance, the International Cultural Association and the Philippine Society of Japan are very enthusiastic over the plans of the PAOA. So are the China International Relations Institute and Philippine-China Trade Association of China, the All India Congress, Siamese leaders such as the editor of the Siam Chronicle and leading government officials, and Indonesian leaders in Java.

With a view to effecting closer contact with different national groups that are already represented in or have large interests in the Philippines, members of the PAOA as individuals have also promoted the formation of bilateral societies such as the Philippine-Japan and the Philippine-China. The next to be organized will be the Philippine-India and Philippine-Siam societies. In these groups the membership is limited to the nationals of the two countries concerned.

Another aim of the leaders of the PAOA movement is to develop an Orientalia in the National Library through the collection from all Oriental countries of literature, books, pamphlets and periodicals about themselves, preferably written by their own nationals. With such a library there will be available to the government and the public ready information and valuable references in their studies on Oriental affairs.

With these modest beginnings, Orientalists in the Philippines believe the way has now been open for the active promotion of the Oriental relations of the Filipino people so that when the day comes for the proclamation of absolute sovereignty the country will be prepared to conduct such relations with honor and benefit.

Democrats Plan Drive To Hold Farmers' Votes operations will cover the territory from Montana to Ohio and from Mexico to Canada.

The organization would be similar to the old Corn Belt Committee which, in the Twenties, built up such a demand for the McNary-Haugen plan of farm relief that it was twice passed by Congress, only to be vetoed both times.

Cooperating in the work of the farm vote group, when it is named, would be Labor's Nonpartisan League, headed by George Berry, Coordinator for Industrial Cooperation, who yesterday announced he was leaving for Chicago with two unidentified farm leaders.

One of these, it was learned today, was Edward A. O'Neal, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation. Since the present administration came into office, Mr. O'Neal has consistently brought his organization to its support.

Would Answer Tariff Arguments

Dissemination of literature setting forth administration efforts to help the farmer is to be the smallest part of the work of the committee, according to those interested in it.

Great pains are being taken by those behind the movement to see to it that only those spokesmen should be selected who can "talk the farmers' language." Underlying the drive for votes will be the thought that the person speaking for the administration will be of equal if not greater importance than the arguments expounded.

Administration strategists hold that the committee's principal task will be to answer the Republican argument that the reciprocal trading policy and control of production have resulted in sacrificing the domestic market to foreign producers.

Planners of the farm campaign assert that while there are ample figures to refute both charges the more important thing is the persons rather than the figures used to refute them.

This is particularly true, they contend, because, as a result of this year's drought, Republican speakers will be able to point to an increased volume of imports of farm products from abroad, and it will be difficult to say to what extent the drought or reciprocity agreements have been responsible.

Some Leaders Not Available

Many of the farm experts who otherwise would be represented on the committee have been lost to the campaign, leaders here say, through their identification with State agencies for the AAA soil-conservation program. Others have their own political campaigns to manage and may not be available.

Included in this latter list is William Hirth of Columbia, Mo., active in the farm movement since the days of the export debenture and equalization fee plans, but now a candidate for the Democratic Gubernatorial nomination.

George N. Peek is regarded as definitely lost to the Democrats and Chester C. Davis, because of his position on the Federal Reserve Board, will not be available.

Somewhat offsetting these losses will be the attitude of many farm leaders, who, not definitely opposed to Mr. Roosevelt's re-election, consider that their future influence with any administration may be determined by their ability to deliver the farm vote to the Democrats.

Many leaders of farm organizations say that President Roosevelt's defeat in the farm States would be a blow to their own prestige. Many of them are convinced that unless Democratic majorities are forthcoming from the rural areas succeeding administrations will be inclined to take their relief demands less seriously.

In addition to other duties set for the committee, Democratic strategists consider that one of the main tasks will be to prevent much of the agrarian vote from slipping into the Lemke fold. Farm organization leaders concede also that their success or failure in countering Mr. Lemke's bid may make them a decisive factor in the campaign.

Dance Experts Get Swing Of New Step

"Swing" music, which started to become popular about last New Year, but which has never been clearly defined in the mind of a large part of the public, has been crystallized into a definite form and has been followed by the "swing" dance.

What the term "swing it!" means exacty, and just how the "swing" dance is tone, were described in detail recently at the third session of the fifty-third annual convention of the Dancing Masters of America, Inc., at the Hotel Roosevelt, New York City.

Miss Virginia Gollatz of Pasadena, Calif., not speaking as a specialist on "swing" by comparison with the other teachers present, but nevertheless with the approval of the convention faculty, according to the New York Times, said this:

"Swing music is any music in 4/4 time, preferably popular music, but in which the drums are accentuated rather than syncopated."

The faculty committee, which really had only become fully conscious of the country's trend to "swing" at a meeting the night before, nodded.

Miss Gollatz proceeded to demonstrate. "Take two slow steps, as in the fox trot," she said. "Then swing the right leg from the hip—that is, the man swings the right and the woman the left. Swing the leg all the way from the hip. Then for variation number one, take two slow steps, and then swing."

The "cut steps," her execution showed, were quick, small steps. The faculty members approved again. It was further explained that much of the popular music being written today is particularly adapted to "swinging it" in dancing.

Four hundred women and two hundred men dancing instructors, from every State in the Union and from Canada and Mexico, attended the convention.

Most of that day was taken up with the demonstration by picked instructors of new variations of dance steps. The delegates followed the steps as a body in the large ballroom. The variations had been developed by waching the general trend of dancing in public resorts of the better type, and it was through this that the trend to "swing" was recognized.

With the trend the "conversation," or open dance very popular with footloose couples during the past few years, is gradually moving in again to the closed dancing position, instructors said. In the "conversation" dance intricate steps are often performed with the couple facing the same way, liked only by one hand.

The night before, the main business session of the convention was held. Nominations for new officers and for a convention site for next year were offered. The board of directors voted recommendation of a minimum 50-cent fee for one hour's instruction. Mrs. Montie Beach is president of the organization and Walter U. Soby secretary-treasurer.

French Senate Votes Teaching Of Patriotism

Stung by criticism from public school teachers regarding the government's military program, the French Senate on August 6 retaliated by adopting a bill for the compulsory teaching of patriotism.

Approved unanimously, the measure would compel teachers to instruct their pupils in "the maintenance of the material integrity and the moral independence of the country, and the duty of assuring national defense by respect for the Constitution," according to the New York Times.

Senators said the measure was inspired by an attack on the Senate at a national convention of teachers where a speaker advocated a demonstration of protest against the Chamber's delay in voting the Socialist government's program.

A resolution adopted by the convention asked the government to reduce military appropriations and shorten the length of army service.

Dern Is Buried

Domei

SALT LAKE CITY, Utah, Sept. 1—President Roosevelt today watched the remains of the late Mr. George H. Dern, Secretary of War, who died on August 27, lowered into a grave in the Mt. Olivet cemetery following the funeral services held at a Mormon tabernacle here.

The funeral procession used a hearse instead of the traditional gun caisson in recognition of Mr. Dern's efforts for the mechanization of the United States Army.

High Air Official Ousted In Britain

Bullock Loses Secretaryship Of Ministry For Seeking Imperial Airways Post

Sir Christopher Bullock, Permanent Secretary to the Air Ministry and member of the Air Council, was dismissed on August 5 by Prime Minister Stanley Baldwin following an inquiry into allegations that he had used his official position in an endeavor to succeed Sir Eric Geddes as chairman of Imperial Airway.

Sir Christopher is 46 years old and has had a distinguished career in the Royal Air Force during the World War and in the development of British aviation, according to the New York Times, whose London despatch of August 5 continues:

The findings of the board of inquiry, published in a government White Paper, together with a statement by Mr. Baldwin, will be issued tomorrow.

The board reports that Sir Christopher's conduct was "completely at variance with the tenor and spirit of the Civil Service Code. This, in its view, "clearly precludes a civil servant from interlacing the public negotiations entrusted to him with the advancement of his personal or private interests." But his conduct did not, in its judgment, influence negotiations between the government and the company.

Mr. Baldwin in his statement says:

"I am glad to observe that, grave as the offense was from the civil service viewpoint, no question of corruption was involved."

According to the report, Sir Christopher had constantly in mind the idea of leaving the civil service and entering a business career, as he had reached as high a position in the service as was ever likely to be open to him, with a salary of £3,000.

It is alleged that he made a suggestion that "a high honor should be conferred on Geddes in recognition of his work in establishing empire air mail services."

Both that and a suggestion that Sir Christopher should succeed him were resented by Sir Eric as "distasteful at a time when negotiations were progressing between Bullock and himself for extension of the Imperial Airways services under a large government subsidy."

The report continues:

"We think the whole course of proceedings shows on the part of Bullock a lack of that instinct and perception from which is derived a sure guide by which the conduct of civil servants should be regulated."

The Times of London says editorially:

"The real tragedy is not that the public service loses a remarkable man, but that so fine a record should have ended under a cloud.

"The civil service, above all, is to be congratulated on having taken into its own hands the inflexible maintenance of its great traditions. It will not suffer in the end for this ruthless exposure of how high is its standard and how rigorous its code."

Bullock Offers Defense

Sir Christopher Bullock, in a statement the same day, said:

"What a world of difference is there between give-and-take living talk and the stale dead ashes of conversations raked over and microscopically dissected after many months.

"The whole atmosphere and emphasis are changed. Transitions from one subject to another are blurred. Phrases taken from the context and subjected to a frigid post-mortem are hardly recognizable. The resuscitation in cold print from three or four out of threescore conversations in the years under review, in which I never raised the issue (of the Imperial Airways chairmanship) at all, inevitably distorts the whole focus.

"In considering myself being associated with Imperial Airways at same indefinite future date, years ahead, if and when I felt able to leave the Air Ministry, the board accepts that I was influenced by the fact that civil aviation seemed a field in which my experiences might best be utilized, not only for my own advantage but also in directions likely to be of service to the State.

"I showed in the evidence that it was at the instance of friends with special interest and knowledge of these matters that I was first led to consider the possibility.

"Perhaps I may add, since there are always those who will whisper mercenary motives, that I believe the remuneration of the chairman of Imperial Airways is £2,000 per annum, or substantially lower than was my own."

Curb On Coughlin Denied By Vatican

with his work" with a due regard for moderation in his language.

Confirms $25,000 Bet

Father Coughlin said on August 5 in Detroit, Mich., that he had not communicated with Bishop Michael J. Gallagher, his church superior, now in Vatican City, but anticipated no changes in his plans for the national political campaign.

Father Coughlin said he would address two Eastern meetings of his National Union for Social Justice Sunday, one at Syracuse, N. Y., and the other at Scranton, Pa.

In a letter to Frederick L. Jenckes of Providence R. I., today the priest confirmed a bet that Representative William Lemke, Union Party Presidential candidate, would poll more Rhode Island votes than would Alf M. Landon, Republican candidate.

Father Coughlin pointed out that his original proposition was to bet $25,000 at odds of 3 to 2 on the result of the Rhode Island vote and not on the national outcome. He said attendants at a mass meeting last Sunday agreed to subscribe the $25,000 and added that he accepted the wager with the understanding the sum would go to orphans of the State if he won.

In a statement to newsmen Father Coughlin said his National Union would give its full support to the Union Party ticket of Mr. Lemke and Thomas C. O'Brien, but declared if its objective should fail "it is our opinion that the country would be better off, at least temporarily, under the leadership of Landon or Norman Thomas."

Australia's Population Shows Big Increase

Domei

CANBERRA, Federal Capital Territory.—Australia's population at March 31 was 6,766,445, an increase of 136,606 since June 30, 1933, according to figures issued recently by the Commonwealth Statistician.

The increase represents an average of 44,151 during the past three years.

Of the total population, 2,663,360 was in New South Wales, 1,346,952 being males and 1,316,408 females. The distribution of the sexes in the whole of Australia shows a surplus of males of 88,913, the proportions being; Males 3,428,179, and females, 3,338,266.

For the three months ended March last natural increase in Australia was 14,496, compared with 13,632 in the corresponding three months of 1935. There was a loss of 1165 by migration compared with a loss in 1935 of 4032.

The net increase in the population during the three months was therefore 13,331, compared with an increase of 9600 for the corresponding three months of 1935.

Edward VIII Stamps On Sale September 1

Domei

LONDON, August 27—Stamps containing the image of King Edward VIII will be on sale for the first time on September 1, according to an announcement today.

The sale, which is in the nature of an experiment, will last five days, after which the new issues which are in denomination of 0½d, 1½d. and 2½d., will only be sold if specially asked for until the remaining stocks of Georgian stamps are exhausted, in probably two or three months.

The new stamps exemplify the prevailing demand in art circles for simplicity.

Cricket has become an interesting annual attraction in the port cities of Kobe and Yokohama in recent years, and it is constantly developing to be an important function as years pass. The interport matches among the Indian Sports Club, The Kobe Cricket Club and the Y.C.A.C. of Yokohama offer a great attraction for the lovers of sport in Kobe and Yokohama. This year the cricket matches promise to be more exciting than before. Mr. Hamilton Holmes the Ex-British consul-general of Yokohama has offered a trophy for interport matches and all the three teams are making strong efforts to win the laurel. Since the season opened, almost every Saturday the recreation ground of Kobe has been the scene of friendly practice matches between the Indian and European Cricket teams of Kobe.

The Indian Sports Club has shown wonderful progress during the last three years, so far as they have been victorious in interport matches with the Yokohama team during the last three years. The Kobe Cricket Club and the Yokohama team are, however, in no way less strong and with their continuous practice they promise to offer a strong fight.

The annual interport cricket meets are scheduled to be held as follow this year. Indian Sports Club of Kobe and Y. C. A. C. of Yokohama will meet on the 12th and 13th of September at Kobe recreation ground again, Indian Sports Club will meet Kobe Cricket Club on the 19th and 20th and both matches are scheduled to be held on the local recreation ground: Kobe Cricket Club will meet Y. C. A. C. on the latter's ground in Yokohama the first week of October.

President Mr. M. D. Moolchand of the Indian Sports Club and his committee propose to hold the matches on a grand scale this year and are making elaborate preparations for entertaining the players. They propose to invite prominent men and women of Kobe and vicinity, both Japanese and foreigners, to witness the games. A dinner will be held in honor of the visitors from Yokohama on September 12.

Mr. James Mills, who will relieve Mr. Babb in Tokyo, is expected to arrive next Thursday from Manchoukuo, having been in that country and North China for the past few months, whither he went after having covered the Italo-Ethiopian "War" for the Associated Press. Mr. Babb plans to leave Japan on the President Hoover for Shanghai about the middle of the month, going on to Nanking and North China and returning here to sail for the United States during the early part of October. Mrs. Babb and their two children are already in America, where he will join them.

Lithuania Makes Accord With Reich

Signs A Trade And Political Pact In Berlin, Giving Advantages To Germany

One of Europe's danger spots was removed, at least for the present, when Germany and Lithuania, signed on August 5 in Berlin a new trade treaty on the basis of reciprocity, together with several supplementary agreements regulating payments, border intercourse and their nationals' labor rights.

The agreements were signed in the German Foreign Office by Baron Constantin von Neurath, German Foreign Minister, and Dr. Jurgis Saulys, Lithuanian Minister to Berlin, according to the New York Times. The Berlin dispatch of August 5 continues: It was announced in a joint communique saying:

"Both governments welcome with satisfaction that after difficult negotiations a treaty has been concluded that can become useful to the economies of both countries.

To Promote Political Relations

"Beyond this purely economic aspect, however, both sides have concluded this agreement consciously and primarily with the intention of contributing thereby to the improvement of their mutual relations and promoting particularly their political relations."

This emphasis on the political aspect of the agreement follows the divergence in views between Germany and Poland on the National Socialist coup in Danzig, for which Poland got nothing in compensation, and parallels the widening of the long-standing breach between Lithuania and Poland, which led each country to withdraw its official news agency correspondent from the other's capital. In the absence of diplomatic or consular relations those correspondents formed the only link between the two countries.

Although theoretically based on reciprocity and equal rights, the agreements seem at first sight to give a preponderant advantage to Germany. They follow the principles of the new German trade policy, which led to the conflict with the United States but proved so advantageous as regards the Balkans.

They provide that Germany shall buy as much agricultural products from Lithuania as that country buys industrial products from Germany, with quotas established for individual goods. Payments will be made through a clearing arrangement, which eliminates the use of foreign exchange.

Weapon for Memel Group

The agreements also provide that 46 per cent of all the pigs that Germany purchases from Lithuania must come from the Memel territory, and these purchases must be administered by the Memel Government dominated by the pro-German party, which thereby obtains a powerful political weapon to reward its adherents and punish its opponents.

One reason for this Lithuanian concession was the German economic blockade, which reduced German purchases from Lithuania about nine-tenths within the last three years while Lithuania was able to cut her imports from Germany only one-third.

The Diplomatische Korrespondenz, the Wilhelmstrasse mouthpiece, emphasized that the agreements were another triumph for the German method of direct negotiations between two countries and that they took their place beside the German-Polish and German-Austrian agreements. At the same time Lithuania was admonished to make many more concessions in the Memel territory as proof that she too is guided by a spirit of conciliation and understanding.

Assure Roosevelt Congress Is 'Safe'

Drewry And Lewis Bring Word That Canvass Indicates Democratic Majorities

Turning to a detailed study of election prospects, President Roosevelt received assurance from the campaign managers on August 6 of the House and Senate that he would have strong Democratic majorities in both branches in the next Congress.

He conferred both collectively and separately with Representative Drewry of Virginia, campaign manager for the House, and with Senator Lewis of Illinois, who occupies the same political post in the Senate, according to the New York Times, whose report of August 6 continues:

Both were luncheon guests at Hyde Park House, Hyde Park, N. Y., in company with J. M. Paterson, publisher, of New York City.

The political conversations with these callers followed the President's call for a conference to meet at the White House on August 10, immediately after his return to the capital, to discuss flood control programs in the regions in the East which suffered heavily in floods last March.

The flood conference was set after Mr. Roosevelt received from Secretary Ickes a report, not made public, outlining a limited number of projects culled from the $330,000,000 omnibus Flood Control Authorization Bill approved by the last Congress. The bill carled no appropriations.

Loss of Seats Held Possible

Representative Drewry said in describing his conversation with the President to news correspondents, that the election prospects "are very good from the Democratic standpoint," although he conceded that some seats probably would be lost in the House.

He expected a slight loss, he said, because of the fact that in 1932 and again in 1934 many districts, which normally were preponderantly Republican, had switched to the Democratic columns in a few occasions for the first time since the Civil War.

On the other hand, he expressed the belief that the Democrats might capture a few districts which now are represented by Republicans, leaving the House only slightly changed from its curent proportion of 315 Democrats and 104 Republicans.

"At the present time there is absolutely no prospect of the Democrats losing control of the House, and they will lose very few seats," he said in describing a survey of possibilities on which he has worked for six months.

Mr. Drewry said he did not consider the Lemke-Townsend-Coughlin combination a threat to the Democrats as much as to the Republicans. As an example of the lack of strength of the third party movement he cited the primaries held in Kansas, where he said only one Townsend candidate was nominated.

Says Business Favors Unified Rule

When Mr. Drewry was asked if a widespread shift back to normal voting by Congressional districts might not restore to Republicans their traditional control of the House, he replied that he did not believe this condition any longer held true. He added that thirtynine seats now held by Republicans in the House were won by majorities of less than 3,000.

In addition he stated the belief that business generally would prefer to have a strong one-party control in Congress, and accordingly would welcome a Democratic majority in the next House to cooperate with the Senate where, with only one-third of the membership involved in the November election, the Democrats will retain control.

"The business people don't want to hurt the situation by having a divided Congress, because that would greatly disturb business conditions," he aserted.

When Mr. Drewry was asked his reaction to a reported offer made yesterday by the Rev. Charles E. Coughlin to bet that Mr. Lemke would poll a larger vote in Rhode Island than Governor Landon, he replied:

"If Lemke beats Landon there, the Democrats will cary Rhode Island."

Lewis Sees Voters Against Change

Senator Lewis based an optimistic prediction alike on the fact that most Senators running for re-election are from traditionally Democratic States and on what he termed the aversion of Americans generally to encourage the growth of "subversive" groups by voting for a political change.

"The nearer that we get in touch with the conflict abroad," he said, "any business man, seeing a rising in America that, if successful, would work the overthrow of every fixture of constitutional government, unsettle property and destroy growing credit, would say there is too much danger in change, even though he disagrees with President Roosevelt.

"As I see it, the farmer and the business man will be for no change as long as they have confidence in the moral integrity of the President."

Flood Tour Not Settled

Mr. Roosevelt probably will leave for Washington on Sunday, but his plans are indefinite, except that he will remain in Washington only for two or three days.

He hopes to fit into his schedule for this month a survey of the two major flood regions in the East, one in Western New York and Northern Pennsylvania and the other in the Ohio Valley near Pittsburgh, and a trip to the drought regions of the Northwest, but his program had not been formed tonight.

It is possible that he may go to the flood regions next week, and then return here for another stay before heading west toward the Dakotas and Minnesota later in the month.

cause it receives the patronage and protection of a particular class of the people."

Mr. Rice dwelt on the difficulty of publishing plays in the United States, which he understood to be equally difficult in Japan.

Admires Kimono

Turning to production questions, he stated that Street Scene had been produced under his personal direction, thus giving him self-confidence in this field. He also mentioned several outstanding American actresses, praising especially Sylvia Sidney and explained his break with the Federal Theater Production as due to political interference which prevented his realizing his aims.

Japan's geisha came in for a word of praise, particularly their kimono, which he termed "a lovely survival of hand decoration in the midst of the machine age." The only Japanese word he had learned, he said in reply to one question was that meaning Thank you, or "Arigato."

Mr. and Mrs. Rice and their two children sailed for the United States aboard the Hikawa Maru at 3 p.m. today.

imitates the bad old traditions."

It thus appears that under Socialism, as under capitalism, the people are not satisfied with restaurant fare.

Occasional Outside Meals

In Soviet Russia, as in other countries, most people like to eat occasional meals in restaurants, but do not relish public dining rooms permanently. Given free choice, they have taken home-cooked meals.

The Communists have not abandoned their theory that Soviet women eventually will prefer to eat in common dining halls. They admit that for the present workers should be permitted to do what they prefer. But the two state public feeding monopolies are urged to seek to recapture their lost customers. Izvestia declares editorially:

"We look forward to the day when managers of our trusts will win back their millions of deserting customers, by providing them with new and comfortable dining rooms serving tasty meals, providing good service and attention."

Californian Wins Chatterton Air Derby

Domei

SAN DIEGO, Sept. 3—Scoring a high total of 1184.18 points out of a possible 1,200, Frank Spreckels of San Francisco, California, was adjudged the winner of the Ruth Chatterton Air Derby here today. Thirty two contestants, including a young Chinese-American woman flier, Miss Katherine Sui Cheng, left the Cleveland Airport on August 29 with all but one of the entrants completing the 2,400-mile hop early this afternoon.

Although the winner has already been announced, one flier, Mr. Bert Gailbraith, has not reported here, officials announced. No fear is felt since he is flying a slow plane and has been trailing all along throughout the derby.

Lloyd-George Sees Hitler

Domei

MUNICH, Sept. 3—Tense interest was aroused in political quarters here today by the revelation that Mr. David Lloyd George, veteran British statesman, who arrived here this morning, left here at 3 p.m. in a motor car for Berchtesgaden, Bavaria, to hold conversations with Chancellor Adolf Hitler who is now spending his vacation at his villa there.

Although nothing has yet been disclosed regarding the forthcoming talks, observers believed that the two statesmen will discuss the whole aspects of the current European situation, notably the crisis precipitated by the present Spanish civil war.

Mr. Lloyd George arrived here this morning from Rotterdam, accompanied by his son and daughter, on an inspection trip of Germany.

Jewish Congress Upholds Boycott

World Meeting Calls For Extension Of Fight Against Nazi Germany's Products

The World Jewish Congress adopted eight resolutions by acclamation at Geneva on August 13 covering the Palestine problem, the German boycott, emigration generally, anti-Semitism, the German Jewish question, refugees, relief and Soviet Russia.

The Palestine resolution, after protesting against Arab outrages, according to the New York Times, says:

"The World Jewish Congress makes the most urgent appeal to the mandatory power and to the League of Nations not to yield even temporarily to the pressure of terrorism and sabotage, but to remain firm in their loyalty to the solemn pledges embodied in the Balfour Declaration and the mandate.

"The Congress at the same time reaffirms the Jewish people's determination to live in peaceful cooperation with their Arab neighbors on a basis of mutual respect for the right of each to make its contribution to the development of their common country."

Declaring that immigration to Palestine is "a fundamental right to the Jewish people," it draws attention to the "desperate situation of the Jewish population in many European countries and the consequent urgency of need for new emigration possibilities, especially while almost all the countries have virtually closed their doors to Jewish immigration."

Spread of Boycott Urged

The resolution affirms that even the temporary suspension or limitation of Palestine immigration would be an "act of injustice and cruelty."

In the boycott resolution the congress "calls on Jewish communities throughout the world to prosecute the boycott of the products and services of Nazi Germany within the framework of the legal conditions and regulations of the individual countries as a measure in defense of Jewish honor."

This resolution is prefaced with a statement explaining that the boycott has achieved "important results," particularly in the United States and Poland, but asserting that it has not changed Germany's policy.

The statement blames this partly on "the unlimited yielding of other powers toward Hitler and the tremendous extent of the employment created through rearmament."

"It should not fail to be noticed that the forms under which the boycott was organized hitherto are not suitable to the achievement of greater results than have been achieved," it states. "For the successful waging of the war, financial means are required exceeding, so far as we can judge, those to which the movement was disposed even in its initial period."

Cooperative Plan Favored

The practical question, it says, is not the continuance of the boycott but only whether it shall be continued in collaboration with non-Jewish organizations as presently, or whether the World Jewish Congress shall incorporate it into its own sphere of action with a view to making it more intense.

The latter idea was rejected because it "cannot hope to achieve results which later, perhaps at a more favorable moment of international political relations, could be achieved."

The resolution on the general emigration problem calls for a committee of experts to study the creation of a Jewish emigration bank the primary task of which would be the liquidation of emigrants' fortunes.

Immigration Appeal Made

This resolution appeals to all governments to modify and relax the present strict regulations governing immigration and asks negotiations with governments and the League in this regard.

The resolution on combatting anti-Semitism instructs the congress to establish a central bureau to fight anti-Semitic propaganda, to take legal action against anti-Semitic libels whenever possible and to obtain legislative condemnation of anti-Semitism.

In its resolution on the German Jewish question the congress "solemnly protests the barbarous persecution of the Jew in Germany." It invites all the Jews in the world "to take up National Socialism's challenge and answer it with energetic resistance until full moral, legal and civil equality is restored to German Jewry and until hatred and the defamation of Jewish history and of the honor of the Jewish people cease."

The refugee resolution thanks James G. McDonald, former League High Commissioner for Refugees Coming from Germany, for his work and asks the September League Assembly to amend the recently drafted refugee statutes in order to legalize the residence of all refugees expelled from Germany.

"The congress demands that the expulsion of refugees shall be possible only in certain narrowly defined cases," the resolution says, "and they should have the right to appeal to the refugee organization."

It insists particularly that the governments of the countries of residence should grant the right of employment to all refugees, and it appeals to all governments "to prevent the extension to their territory of racial legislation adopted by the present Germany."

This resolution was adopted after George Bernhard had pictured the plight of 75,000 refugees as "terrible," and had charged that refugees were often expelled from their countries of residence for seeking work.

The resolution on relief instructs the executive committee to devise a concrete plan and to win the cooperation of other Jewish as well as non-Jewish agencies.

The resolution on Russia asks the executive committee to negotiate with Moscow to raise the restrictions on the Jewish language and religion and Zionism.

Kenzo Ishiwara, Privy Councillor Dies Friday

Mr. Kenzo Ishiwara, Privy Councillor, died Friday evening at his residence at Gotanda, Shinagawa, at the ago of 73. The funeral service will be held at the Aoyama Funeral Hall at 10 a.m. Tuesday.

Mr. Ishiwara graduated from Tokyo Imperial University in 1889, and became a judge, but later served as governor in various different prefectures. In 1915, he was appointed Vice-Minister of the Imperial Household Department, and in 1922, was made a member of the House of Peers. He was appointed a member of the Privy Council in 1928.

THE CHOICE OF THE MULTITUDE

Scientists To See Sun Operate Steam Engine

tion, who gave the world its first proof of the practicability of mechanical flight several years before the Wright brothers actually flew in heavier-than-air machines.

Ready as Coal Substitute

Dr. Abbott, who began his scientific career as a technical assistant of Dr. Langley, believes that he has now brought his solar heater to a point of efficiency where, in event of any shortage of coal or oil, it could take over the business of producing power. Using the sun's rays for the first time to a degree of efficiency comparable to other fuels, Dr. Abbot will demonstrate his progress by operating a one-half horsepower steam engine before about 700 foreign and more than 2,000 American conference delegates, drawn from among the men who have built the great dams and power plants and who manage the great mines, industries and power systems of the world.

In operation, the Abbot solar machine is described as simple. He has demonstrated the principles of solar heating before, but has brought his equipment to a new high state of perfection. The new simplicity is what has made it so hard to perfect, other "sun machines" having involved such costly and complicated equipment that they have proved impractical.

The new solar heater consists of three chief elements. The first is a series of three metal sheets which reflect the sun's rays in such a way as to concentrate them in a focal line no wider than a lead pencil; the other two parts consist of a series of pyrex tubes and a simple chemical compound which flows through the tubes.

Temperature 400 Degrees

The rays of the sun reflect on the metal and are concentrated on the tube, causing the fluid to reach a temperature of 400 degrees fahrenheit. At this high temperature the chemical compound moves through the tubes, which are introduced into a boiler. The heat converts the water into steam, and the steam is employed to run the engine. Although, for the demonstration before before the conference, Dr. Abbot will use only a small engine, it is said that the method can be employed to run a machine of almost any size.

The solar heater which will be demonstrated is described as three and one-half times more efficient than any similar device ever developed. The heat efficiency compares with that of coal at about three dollars a ton.

The possibilities of the machine are unlimited, it is pointed out. It is expected to be of particular value in arid regions where sunshine is almost constant. It can be used to pump water, which could be stored and used later for irrigation purposes, and for development of hydro-electric power. It can be used also for such domestic purposes as refrigeration, air conditioning, cooking and heating.

Inexhaustible Power Supply Seen

Speaking of his machine, Dr. Abbot said: "There will come a time, probably still far distant, when coal and oil will be luxuries. Hydro-electric power will always be available. But it may well be that the inexhaustible energy of the sun's rays, millions of times exceeding all probable demands, may be called upon.

"If so, it is hoped that these studies which I have made of efficient methods to utilize the sun's rays for power may lead to an economic solution. Indeed, the present machine, crude though it may seem a century hence, would enable the power world to make the transition from coal and oil without much sacrifice.

"In the mean time, there are numerous small applications of solar heat for cooking, for refrigeration, for evaporation and for small-power uses, which may be easily arranged with present types of equipment. Ranchers in cloudless localities all over the world show much interest in these possibilities."

Heat Losses Reduced

Dr. Abbot has studied the effects of the sun during most of his lifetime. The energy of the sun's rays which would fall at sea level on a cloudless day on a square yard of surface at right angles to the rays would slightly exceed one-horse power if they could be turned completely into mechanical work. But much of the energy is lost, and in perfecting any machine utilizing the rays of the sun the effort has been to reduce the heat losses and concentrate the rays so as to raise a high working temperature in the solar engine.

Dr. Abbot's improvements lie in the cheap yet accurate and efficient ray collector employed and in the highly efficient and heat-saving absorber for the collected rays.

He employs three parabolic cylindrical mirrors of Alcoa sheet, a commercial product of the Aluminum Company of America. This comes in large sizes as a flat thin sheet of very light specific gravity, reflecting more than 80 per cent of solar rays, and so permanent in surface that a year's exposure to the weather makes no appreciable deterioration.

"Cradle" Gathers Sun Rays

A simple metallic framework of aluminum and duralumin makes up a cradle of the exact parabolic curvature required. He prefers the curve whose equation is Y^2 equals 3X and uses a unit mirror with a sheet about two feet wide and six feet long.

At the focus the rays pass through two concentric tubes of Pyrex glass of 1¼-inch and ⅞-in diameters respectively until they reach a central ½-inch Pyrex tube, metal plated on the top third of its circumference, within which flows a black liquid called Aroclor.

This liquid is a chlorinated diphenyl compound made by the Monsanto Chemical Company, of St. Louis. With addition of a very little lampblack it almost totally absorbs the focused solar rays, and though still liquid when reduced to ordinary temperatures, it does not boil or flash at 662 degrees Fahrenheit.

Vacuum Between Tubes

A high vacuum is maintained between the tubes so that heat is lost only by radiation, as in a thermos bottle. A flow of the liquid is maintained either by gravity circulation, as for the water boiler of a domestic furnace, or by a pump.

Experiments and theory agree in promising an overall efficiency of 15 per cent for steam power production. This contemplates a boiler at 200 degrees Centigrade so that its maximum theoretical thermodynamic efficiency is about 40 per cent. Losses by reflections, inefficiency of steam engine, etc., bring the final figure to 15 per cent. This is a substantial improvement on previous sun motors.

Wide use of sun power, it is pointed out, would, of course, require cooperating storage of power—by reservoirs for water, by chemical synthesis, or even by storage of heat itself.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Expression "Quiz" Is The Result Of A Wager

"Quiz" and all its derivatives originated in a joke. Richard Daly, a famous Irish character of Dublin, Ireland, and an inveterate better, wagered that he would within 24 hours introduce a meaningles new word into the English language. The four letters Q U I Z were then chalked and posted on every wall in Dublin and Daly won his bet. He was, at the time, the manager of the Theatre Royal in Dublin, 1789.

Social and Personal Notes

TOKYO VISITOR

Miss Lillian Brown of the advertising department of the Honolulu Advertiser, arrived on the President Taft Monday for a 10-day visit in Tokyo. She will go to Nikko, Kyoto, Nara, and Kobe before continuing to Mukden, Peiping and Shanghai.

SERVICES BEING RESUMED

The regular services of the Tokyo Union Church will be resumed on Sunday, September 13. At the 4 p.m. service on that day the chairman of the Board will be the preacher. Announcement of the opening sessions of the church school will be made later through these columns.

GUEST OF HONOR

Mr. Randall Gould, editor of the Shanghai Evening Post and Mercury, who is now a Tokyo visitor, will be the guest of honor at a dinner given by Mr. Eiji Amau, director of the information section of the Foreign Office, this evening.

RETURNING TO U.S.

Mrs. F. M. Gibson of Manila is in Tokyo for a two-weeks visit en route to her home in Pennsylvania.

RETURN FROM TRIP

Mr. Shoji Aritaki has returned from a four-weeks trip through Kyushu and Tohoku. He visited Unzen, Beppu, Aomori, Akita and the Yuze hot springs.

RETURN FROM RESORT

Mr. and Mrs. E. Scattergood Kirkham and their daughter have returned to Tokyo from Karuizawa where they spent the summer.

VACATIONS PROLONGED

Because of the prolonged heat, many Tokyo residents who had planned to return this week from summer resorts, will remain away from the city for another week. However, the majority will close their summer homes early next week and return for the opening of the American school on September 16.

SPEAKER ILL

Mr. Kojiro Tomita, speaker of the House of Representatives, is ill at his home in Tokyo.

RETURNS FROM TRIP

Wing-Commander R. W. Chappell, air attache at the British Embassy, has returned from a trip to Manchuria.

RETURN FROM RESORT

Dr. and Mrs. C. W. Iglehart have returned to Aoyama Gakuin from Lake Nojiri where they spent part of the summer.

AT SANNO HOTEL

New arrivals at the Sanno Hotel are: Mr. M. Taneda, Mr. S. Masamitsu, Mr. N. Hirano, Mr. T. Takahashi, Mr. K. Takahashi, Mr. K. Minowa, Mr. S. Kondo, Mr. S. G. Jamsandkar, Mr. B. B. Siltane, Mr. K. TO NORTH CHINA

A party of seven officials of the Ministry of Agriculture and Forestry headed by Hr. Kazuo Miura, Chief of the Superintendence Section of the Forestry Bureau, is leaving Tokyo for North China on September 15 to inspect agricultural conditions.

Agriculture and Forestry Minister Toshio Shimada gave a farewell luncheon in honor of the members of the party at 1 p.m. Monday at the Imperial Hotel.

HACHIOJI SWIMMING CLUB ENTERTAINS

Under the auspices of the Hachioji Swimming Club, an entertainment was held on Thursday evening, September 3 at Honmoku Beach. Bright colored lanterns were hung in front of the huts, where the refreshments were being sold, each stall being decorated with gay posters advertising their wares.

Those in charge of the booths were: Icecream, Miss Beryl Clark and Mrs. Mrs. Maurice Russel; Beer, Miss Robson and Mr. Apcar; Lemonade, Mrs. Mc. Crae; Coffee and tea, Mrs. Apcar and Mrs. Elked; Hungarian wine and Goulash, Mrs. Metzger and Mrs. Soler; Russian food, Mrs. W. Helm; Hotdogs, Mrs. J. Helm; Popcorn, Miss Dorothy Robson. Entrance tickets were sold by Miss Dorothy Wells.

Because of the sudden shower earlier in the evening, it was suggested that the performance be postponed to the following evening, however, as the audience arrived in spite of the inclement weather, the entertainment, under the direction of Miss Ruth Apcar and Mrs. C. Stillwell, commenced at 8 o'clock. The open air platform was considerably dampened, making it somewhat difficult to execute the dances, however, that fact did not lessen the enthusiasm of the performers, and great appreciation was shown by the audience, who heartily applauded each number. The program consisted of the following numbers:

"Little Hopefuls"; Margaret Mc. Crae, Veronica and Rudy Helm, Catherine and Mickie Apcar, Raymond and Donald Helm, Dickie Herr, Maruha Soler.

Hungarian Dance; Bertha Komor.

Waltz Clog; Carmen Planas, Louis Stillwell.

Dance of the Garlands; Dorothy, Lucille and Catherine Apcar.

Dance Fantasie; Mira, Veronica and Olga Helm, Margot Westermier, Juan Soler, Willie and Donald Helm.

Russian Dance; Dora Helm.

Ballet Dance; Shirley Bell and Nathalie Correll.

Shadow Play; Winifred and Joan Clark.

Song and Tap; Dorothy and Lucille Apcar.

Gipsy Dance; Olga Helm.

Song; Mrs. Oberst.

Buck Rhythm; Louise Stillwell.

Temple Dance; Alice Kildoyle.

"The Words are in My Heart"; Miss Apcar and Chorus.

During the intermission, a bottle of Hungarian wine, donated by Mr. Metzger, was auctioned off, and went to Mr. J. Helm as the highest bidder. Also the winning numbers of the raffle, for which the prizes were given by Mrs. Soler and Mrs. Correll, were drawn. The first prize a case of beer, going to Mr. Perez, the second, a chocolate cake to Mrs. Soler.

The fortune teller, Mrs. Gripper, advertised as Madame Badescanyer, did thriving business, being very popular with both the wide-eyed, eager youngsters and skeptical adults. The shooting gallery was also a great attraction, the booth being crowded all evening. The youths in charge were, Ronald Russell, Donald Cull, George Agajan and Jock Mc. Crae.

Following the entertainment some of the party went in swimming, while others enjoyed the dancing, for which the music was provided by the courtesy of the Columbia Gramophone Company. Between dances Gerald Nishigori and Henry Fernandez sang several songs with ukelele accompaniments.

Battle For US Industrial Democracy Described

bolized and dominated by the New York banking house of J. P. Morgan and Company.

Operating Policies

By acting as fiscal agents for our large, national corporations, this group has been able to place its own representatives on their boards of directors and to determine, as in the case of the U. S. Steel Corporation, their financial and operating policies. Our basic financial, manufacturing, mining, transportation and utility interests have thus been brought under domination of this financial cabal.

In its earlier manifestations—from the beginning of the century to the World War—this financial dictatorship was flamed by those who vainly but gallantly fought against it—Congressman Lindbergh, the elder LaFollette, President Theodore Roosevelt, Justice Brandeis, President Wilson, Senator Norris, and a score of other crusaders for democracy and humanity—as the "Money Trust", or "The Invisible Government."

Profiteering during the World War greatly augmented the sources and power of this group. Its corporate and political control was also greatly extended by the speculative excesses of the so-called "New Era" of 1923-1929.

In his inaugural address of March 4, 1933 President Roosevelt, in reviewing essential reforms, referred to the fundamental significance of this group by the declaration that "The Money-Changers must be driven from the Temple." The Banking and Currency Committee of the United States Senate after several years of careful investigation later reported, during the summer of 1934, that during the post-war decade this financial oligarchy had usurped "the wealth stream of the nation to its very capillaries."

Economic Dictatorship

An economic dictatorship has thus become firmly established in America which at the present time is focussing its efforts upon retaining the old system of finance-capitalism which was in operation before the depression and thus preventing the attainment of political and industrial democracy by the people.

Organized labor in America accepts the challenge of the omnipresent overlords of steel to fight for the prize of economic freedom and industrial democracy. The issue involves the security of every man or woman who works for a living by hand or by brain. The issue cuts across every major economic, social and political problem now pressing with incalculable weight upon the 130 millions of people of this nation. It is an issue of whether the working population of this country shall have a voice in determining their destiny or whether they shall serve as indentured servants for a financial and economic dictatorship which would shamelessly exploit our natural resources and debase the soul and destroy the pride of a free people. On such an issue there can be no compromise for labor or for a thoughtful citizenship. I call upon the workers in the iron and steel industry who are listening to me tonight to throw off their shackles of servitude and join the union of their industry. I call upon the workers in the textile, lumber, rubber, automotive and other unorganized industries to join with their comrades in the steel industry and forge for themselves the modern instruments of labor wherewith to demand and secure participation in the increased wealth and increased productive efficiency of modern industrial America. The more than a million members of the twelve great National and International Unions associated with the Committee for Industrial Organization will counsel you and aid you in your individual and collective efforts to establish yourselves as free men and women in every economic, social and political sense. I unhesitatingly place the values represented by thirty million human beings engaged in industry and their sixty million dependents as being above and superior in every moral consideration to the five billions of inanimate dollars represented by the resources of the American Iron and Steel Institute or to the additional billions of inanimate dollars that perforce may be allied with the empire of steel in the impending struggle which the Institute, in the brutality of its arrogance, seeks to make inevitable.

Warburg to Lead Aid to Reich Jews

Banker Is Named American Chairman Of Council To Expatriate Nazi Victims

Felix M. Warburg, New York banker and philanthropist, was named chairman of the American division of the executive committee of the Council for German Jewry, on August 18.

The world-wide body was organized last Spring to coordinate efforts to expatriate 100,000 German Jews within four years, according to the New York Times.

Sir Herbert Samuel, first British High Commissioner for Palestine, was designated chairman of the executive's British branch.

Members of the executive committee for America named were Paul Baerwald, chairman of the joint distribution committee; Charles J. Liebman, vice president of the Refugee Economic Corporation, Morris Rothenberg, chairman of the administrative committee of the Zionist Organization of America, and Dr. Stephen S. Wise, president of the American Jewish Congress.

Council To Meet in London

The first meeting of the Council for German Jewry will be held in London in the early Fall. In the event the members of the American division are unable to attend, George Backer, David M. Bressler, Israel Goldstein, James N. Rosenberg and Nathan Straus have agreed to act as alternates.

The council was organized in London, where, since January, a force of workers has been making statistical studies of economic conditions in countries the world over in an attempt to facilitate the resettlement of persecuted German Jews. Last February Sir Herbert Samuel, Lord Bearsted and Simon Marks visited New York to make preliminary plans for the organization of the American branch.

The specific work of the American division will be to allocate the funds raised by various Jewish philanthropic organizations here for the purpose of assisting in the expatriation of Jews from Nazi Germany.

Mr. Warburg has long been active in Jewish charity. For more than twenty years he served as chairman of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee.

Escaped Convict Gives Up After 13 Years' Freedom

Rosolino Fanara, 54-year-old escaped convict, returned to Auburn prison, New York State, recently, after thirteen years of freedom, surrendered to the prison warden and announced he wanted to serve out his term so he could "go back to his family."

The prison records disclosed that Fanara escaped from a prison camp in the town of Miles on Sept. 25, 1922, in company with another convict, according to the New York Times. He was received in the prison in January of that year from Wayne County under a sentence to serve a year and eleven months to two years and seven months for unlawful possession of firearms.

Fanara said that since his escape he had worked in Baltimore and other East Coast cities, longing to return to Batavia to see his family, but afraid to do so lest he be captured.

Russian Wears Gas Mask Eighteen Days In Test

A Soviet soldier had been wearing a gas mask for eighteen days on August 11 and has not yet completed an experiment to see how long he could keep the apparatus on without deleterious effects.

Three times a day the soldier, Gregory Danchenko, removes the mask to eat, according to the New York Times, whose dispatch from Khabarovsk on August 11 continues: Otherwise it is on 24 hours a day, while he sleeps and works, play volley ball and attends the movies. He told doctors watching his reactions that he had become so accustomed to the device he hardly noticed it any more.

The experiment may be concluded tomorrow.

Landon Declared Against Isolation

Nominee Is Quoted As Favoring Cooperation With Nations While Keeping Independence

Governor Alfred M. Landon of Kansas is not an isolationist. He believes in peace and harmony among nations and the carrying on of trade relations and friendly intercourse.

He does not believe in mixing the United States into foreign political entanglements which have no interest or concern in this country, according to Cecil Howes in the New York Times. His Topeka despatched of August 10 continues: He believes in the sanctity of contracts and, by that token, he may be expected to urge the settlement of foreign debts owing to the United States.

The Republican party having a traditional opposition to the League of Nations, it may be said that Governor Landon does not plan of expect to attempt to bring the United States into that organization, although at times the United States might work with governments of the League in various activities in which all the world may have a vital interest.

"Independence of Judgment"

"The Republican party has declared and I am pledged and prepared to support a program in which we will take every opportunity to promote among the nations a peace based upon justice and human rights," said Governor Landon.

"We will join in no plan which would take from us that independence of judgment which has made the United States a power for good in the world. We will join no plan which might involve us in a war in the beginning of which we had no part, or that would build a false peace on the foundation of armed camps.

"I propose and the Republican party is back of a program for the advancement of justice and peace. From the very beginning of our nation we have traditionally urged the adjustment of international disputes in accordance with law, equity and justice. I believe we must adhere to and continue our loyalty to this principle."

Protection Also for Consumers

Governor Landon believes in the protection of the home markets to the farmers of the United States, but holds that this protection must not work to the injury of the consumer.

Pointing out that the United States regularly was able to produce more wheat, corn, cattle, hogs, sheep and cotton than the 125,000,000 people of this country can consume, he said:

"Our farmers are entitled to all of the home market they can supply without injustice to the consumer.

"We must find markets for our surplus products and we cannot expect people to buy from us unless we also buy from them.

"We must encourage foreign commerce, not only because it is economically sound but because friendly and cordial trade relations aid in the establishment of confidence and friendliness among the different peoples.

"By the policies at present in vogue in the United States, the American farmer has been taken out of the foreign markets. The foreign farmer has been put into the American market.

"The loss of the markets, both at home and abroad, far outweighs the value of all the benefits paid to the farmers of this country through the various plans which have been tried in this country in the last three years.

"It seems to me there are many methods which this country may undertake with other countries in addition to reciprocal trade agreements by which there may be an extension of the exchange of goods for an increase in the market of the goods of the United States in different countries."

Attitude on Loans and Debts

While the Governor did not discuss what other plans he might have in mind, it is well known among his friends and advisors that he does not believe in government loans to governments, but he thinks this country may undertake a mistaken policy by prohibiting the making of industrial loans by American bankers to industrialists in foreign countries because these may have an important effect upon the markets for goods of this country.

It is believed by friends close to the Governor that he may propose adjustments of the debts which any country may owe the United States and is expected to object strenuously to any repudiation.

However, his interest in working out solutions of the mortgage troubles of the farmers and home owners in Kansas would indicate a willingness to make such proper adjustments in debts as economic conditions might require after thorough study of all the conditions involved.

"The whole world has tried to conquer the depression by different methods," suggested Governor Landon. "Not one of them has been fully successful. Too frequently recovery has been hindered; if not defeated by political considerations.

"So it seems to me there must be a world study of economic conditions. No one nation can solve the problems facing our peoples today alone and without consideration of the people of other nations. We must all study the general problems together and work out the details as best suits our own situation."

Some of the pupils engaged in catching cuttlefish gets as much as ¥10 a day.

MAN FOUND DRIFTING ON SURFACE OF SEA

A man afloat on the sea and clutching to a wooden plank off Kochi Prefecture, Shikoku Island, was rescued by the s.s. Milan Maru last Monday about 8 a.m.

On board the Milan Maru, the man gave his name as Shinji Naka, 30 years old. According to his story, he embarked on the s.s. Miyako Maru on September 3 at Naha in the Loochoos to go to Kobe.

While at sea, Naka began to suspect that some of the passengers were planning to throw him overboard, and he preferred to jump overboard himself with a plank of wood at about 8 p.m., Sunday. Thus he had been adrift on the sea for some 12 hours before he was rescued. The Kobe Water Police suspect the man is insane.

'Prosperity' Issue Ready In Alberta

Circulation Of 250,000 $1 Bills Begins In The Social Credit Certificate Program

Circulation of the Alberta Social Credit Government's first issue of prosperity certificates began on August 5. Each of the 250,000 bills has a face value of $1.

One of the first purchases with the certificates was made by Lucien Maynard, Minister Without Portfolio in charge of certificates. He spent $1.87, and received legal tender money in change, but other persons will receive a credit slip for the difference between the purchase price and the amount of the certificate tendered, according to the New York Times, whose Edmonton (Canada) dispatch of August 5 continues:

All of the first issue, except a portion sold to souvenir hunters and a few bought by the Minister, was sent to Provincial constituencies to be paid to workers as July wages on various construction projects.

On each certificate a 1 per cent stamp must be affixed Aug. 12 and every week thereafter during its two-year life.

The certificates, 6 inches long and 3¾ inches wide, will be valid only if stamps are affixed for as many weeks as have elapsed since the date of issue.

By Aug. 3, 1938, if stamps are attached every week, there will be 104 stamps on each certificate and each will be redeemed by the Provincial Treasurer for $1 in legal tender.

The certificates bear a marked resemblance to a Bank of Canada $1 bill. They are light green and black on the front side with a white border. The government's seal is printed at one side, flanked by the following notice:

"The Provincial Treasurer will pay to the bearer the sum of $1 on the expiration of two years from date of issue hereof upon presentation hereof, provided there are then attached to the back hereof 104 1 cent certificate stamps."

Although Premier Aberhart has emphasized that the certificates were issued only to provide purchasing power to those who have no purchasing power, Cabinet Ministers have offered to take part of their salaries in certificates merely as gestures of confidence in the ability of certificates to circulate.

None of the Cabinet Ministers took any of the first issue as salary, but Mr. Maynard announced that a definite arangement for them to do so later would be made by the end of August.

US Labor Seen As 95 Pct. Behind Roosevelt

work. They would tell you that if they could extend credit to warring nations that credit would be used in the United States to build homes and factories and pay our debts. They would tell you that America once more would capture the trade of the world.

Difficult to Resist

It would be hard to resist that clamor; it would be hard for many Americans, I fear, to look beyond—to realize the inevitable penalties, the inevitable day of reckoning that comes from a false prosperity. To resist the clamor of that greed, if war should come, would require the unswerving support of all Americans who love peace.

If we face the choice of profits or peace, the nation will answer—must answer—"we choose peace." It is the duty of all of us to encourage such a body of public opinion in this country that the answer will be clear and for all practical purposes unanimous.

With that wise and experienced man who is our Secretary of State, whose statesmanship has met with such wide approval, I have thought and worked long and hard on the problem of keeping the United States at peace. But all the wisdom of America is not to be found in the White House or in the Department of State; we need the meditation, the prayer and the positive support of the people of America who go along with us in seeking peace.

Always Some Loopholes

No matter how well we are supported by neutrality legislation, we must remember that no laws can be provided to cover every contingency, for it is impossible to imagine how every future event may shape itself. In spite of every possible forethought, international relations involve of necessity a vast uncharted area. In that area safe sailing will depend on the knowledge and the experience and the wisdom of those who direct our foreign policy. Peace will depend on the day to day decisions.

At this late date, with the wisdom which is so easy after the event and so difficult before the event, we find it possible to trace the tragic series of small decisions which led Europe into the great war in 1914 and eventually engulfed us and many other nations.

Must Have Courage to Say No

We can keep out of war, if those who watch and decide have a sufficiently detailed understanding of international affairs to make certain that the small decisions of each day do not lead toward war and if, at the same time, they possess the courage to say "no" to those who selfishly or unwisely would let us go to war.

Of all the nations of the world today we are in many ways most singularly blessed. Our closest neighbors are good neighbors. If there are remoter nations that wish us not good but ill, they know that we are strong; they know that we can and will defend ourselves and defend our neighborhood.

We seek to dominate no other nation. We ask no territorial expansion. We oppose imperialism. We desire reduction in world armaments.

We believe in democracy; we believe in freedom; we believe in peace. We offer to every nation of the world the handclasp of the good neighbor. Let those who wish our friendship look us in the eye and take our hand.

Spanish America Watches Trends

Special Interest Evinced By Continent; Crowds Await News In Streets

Spanish America's interest in the Mother Country's civil war seems to have been overlooked in the international fears that the peninsula may provide another Sarajevo spark to set Europe ablaze.

Yet it is obvious that a continent with many ancestral ties and large Spanish communities should evince a special interest in the course of the revolutionary events. This has been reflected in special editions of the daily newspapers and day and night crowds waiting in the "streets of ink" for the latest news, according to the Santiago correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor.

Heavy News Coverage

Record cable tolls were paid for exclusive despatches on the conflict and news agencies were called upon to treble their coverage to satisfy the news-hungry South Americans.

It is giving away no secrets to record that several administrations have been anxious regarding the outcome of the Spanish revolution. The anxiety is patent to all and revealed in many different ways.

It was widely conceded that owing to racial affiliations the outcome would have important influence on future political trends in the Spanish-speaking part of the New World and especially on the radical and Fascists forces which have already been in sharp collision in several of the countries. Immediate local repercussions are forecast when the final victor emerges in the mother country.

Popular Front Concerned

Leaders of the Popular Front in Argentine and Chile have evinced special concern. This political combination of the Left was only recently formed in the two trans-Andean countries, following the electoral success of the Popular Front in Spain.

It was modeled on the mother country's pattern and political tactics have been similar in opposition, for both Argentina and Chile are still governed mainly from the Right. In the first country a National Front, with a distinct Fascist bias was organized as a counter-blast. In Chile there is an active National Socialist organization and the Left contends there is a Fascist background to the Republican militia. An attempt to bind the conservative and liberal governing parties into a National Front failed.

Deny Communists Ties

Whatever may be the reason, prominent leaders of the Radical parties in both countries have hastily disclaimed connection with the Communists—in two noteworthy declarations since the Spanish revolt commenced.

Ever since the Popular Front was organized, liberals and men of good will have fruitlessly appealed for such assurances. Now they have them in abundance, for the whole Radical Party seems bent on letting the world know that it is not Communist.

The first declaration was by Dr. Marcelo Alvear, an ex-President of Argentina, who, speaking for the Radicals, said his party would not be associated with the Communists in the Popular Front because the latter resorted to violence.

Octavio Senoret, for the Chilean Radicals, reminded communistic and Socialist members of the Popular Front that his party would not tolerate association with disorders or unconstitutional procedure.

More Tolerant to Extremists

Such declarations are in consonance with the historic policies of South American Radicals, representative of the professional and lower middle classes, and, so far as Argentina and Chile are concerned, the strongest political parties.

In latter times, however, there has been much fraternization with the Socialists and Communists, and when the Popular Front scored its parliamentary successes in France and Spain, the local Radicals immediately became more tolerant toward the extremists.

They accepted a similar combination here, not because they felt any nearer to the Socialists and Communists, but because they saw the opportunity of attaining clear-cut power by electoral consolidation with them.

What they intended to do afterward is a party secret, but there were numerous suggestions they would sever the tie if possible. Meantime, the most was made of the Popular Front. Radicals and Communists embraced each other on the public platform and expounded a common program.

Politics in Confused State

The Spanish revolutionary bomb exploded embarrassingly on this scene. In Chile a Radical was fighting a critical senatorial by-election at Coquimbo under the banner of the Popular Front; in Argentina the Left was flaring indignantly before a National Front demand for a military dictatorship because the masses were "too ignorant for democratic government."

"Yet it was at that time the Radical leaders in both countries made a formal retraction and denied cooperation with the extreme Left. It may be only a coincidence that at that time, also, the Popular Front in Spain seemed to be fighting a losing battle against the rebel Conservative forces.

Trade—Military Trend

A victory of the Spanish right-Conservative, Fascist or however it may be labeled—would probably have early repercussions in South America. It would be an incentive to the military forces to intervene in government and to discontented political forces to recur to the barracks for support.

Traders and business men, beset with their taxation troubles in several countries, might also feel that a military alliance would be worth while. This last trend has been in evidence recently and it would be strengthened by the knowledge that the military, in the last resort, can impose authority.

A Stabilized Democracy

South American commenators are in a quandary as to predicting local reactions from a victory of the Spanish Left. The Radical declarations have revealed, perhaps, that the leading political party has been disappointed with the excesses of the Popular Front when in power.

That, assuredly, would be their explanation if the Popular Front turned out the ultimate victors. But there seems to be little fear of any popular revolution in the leading countries, even though Spanish ancestry is dominant in South Americans.

There would be great rejoicings on the part of the workers, and, as general elections are pending in several states, probably a series of Left wing victories. But in Spanish America the economic conditions of the workers, especially those in the cities, are considered to be better than those of the Spaniards, and there is not the rooted social discontent to foment a revolution. There is also more than a century of republican tradition and an atmosphere of stabilized democracy forming a bulwark against civil war and violence.

Rome Seeking Control Of Its People Abroad

off in terms of increased lire purchases.

Mussolini does not wish to import meat or wheat in quantities from America, and has spurred the corporative state to reduce to the minimum Italian imports of minerals and metals.

Fascist Units Spreading

Quite a different network of interchange reveals itself when the Fascist influence in the Americas is viewed from the angle of moral and spiritual—in the Fascist lexicon these terms mean political—phases. Every American city with a complement of Italian residents eith. has a Fascist organization or has one coming up. Dozens of Italian-language newspapers, which at one time were the natural outcroppings of large Italian communities, have been bought by the Fascist party. Their policies are dictated from Rome. In increasing numbers they are receiving editors sent from Rome or other Italian cities. Their influence in unifying overseas Italians behind the Fascist emblem is admitted to be enormous.

The blackshirt stimulus does not stop there. In Buenos Aires the Italian Chamber of Commerce, organized as an independent entity under the Argentine democracy, recently voted half its capital for foundation of a Fascist journal.

Big Italian community mutual associations in many American cities have yielded to the Fascist trend. Their officers, once freely elected, now must pass muster in Rome. The Dante Alighieri schools in America were organized and at one time controlled by Italo-Americans. Now their instructors wear the black shirt.

Six years ago Mussolini started bringing prize-winning students to Italy at government expense. Last summer more than 200 came from Argentina alone, hundreds from other countries. This summer Italo-American youths eager to visit a victorious fatherland are expected to run into the thousands.

Fascists find the results of this human cultivation abroad another "glorious augury for Fascism."

Shipyards Having Busiest Time In Britain Since 1930

No Fewer Than 229 Merchant Vessels Of 848,732 Tons Are On The Slips

A greater tonnage of ships, mercantile and naval, is building in the ship-yards of Great Britain and Northern Ireland than at any time since the end of 1930—about one million tons gross, according to the Observer.

To particularise—no fewer than 229 merchant vessels of 848,732 tons are on the slips or fitting out, being equivalent to more than two-thirds (43.5 per cent.) of the world's total, while more men-of-war are under construction than at any time since the Peace Treaty was signed. This activity has stimulated employment throughout the country, from the mining areas which produce the coal for steel making to the many towns and cities which supply various items of ship equipment.

So far as merchant shipbuildng is concerned, the change in the situation which has occurred in this country and abroad is reflected in the following figures of the tonnage launched and commenced in the first six months of this and last year:—

	British		Foreign
	1935	1936	1935	1936
	— (Tons gross) —
Started	252,508	514,845	456,592	742,568
Launched	222,108	362,233	380,140	501,255

The position in the British shipyards is much better than it was, but about half the berths are still empty. though under the rationalization scheme carried out by the industry itself the output capacity has been reduced from three million to two million tons.

Shipbuilding remains the most distressed of all British industries.

Though there is a shortage of certain craftsmen, according to the latest statistics of the Ministry of Labor, nearly one-third of the registered workers trained as shipbuilders and ship repairers are still without work, the percentage on the North-East Coast, though much smaller than it was, being as high as 38.1.

Further Orders

There are no signs of "a boom," but masters and men can, nevertheless, look forward to a much more cheerful winter than they have experienced for several years past if the Admiralty places its contracts for new men-of-war during the next few months. A good deal of new merchant work is also anticipated. The keel of the companion ship of the Queen Mary will shortly be laid down in the Clydebank yard of Messrs. John Brown and Co., and several smaller liners for the Cunard White Star Company are contemplated, while other liner companies cannot delay much longer renewing their fleets.

If, as a result of the enquiry by the Imperial Shipping Committee into the Pacific shipping problem, which has been created by the subsidized American line, a basis of cooperation is discovered, the P. and O.'s subsidiary (the Union Steamship Company of New Zealand) and the Canadian Pacific Steamship Line will order four liners.

In addition, further contracts for oil tankers are expected, although 79 of 656,626 tons gross are already in hand in the world's shipyards.

Lost Orders

The least satisfactory feature of the shipbuilding situation is the large number of orders which British shipbuilders have lost owing to circumstances beyond their control. As a result of the disorganization of the exchanges, the existence of "frozen credits" in Germany and elsewhere, and the general scramble for work, Germany is building nearly 180,000 tons gross of shipping for other countries. Sweden, 102,150 tons, Denmark 59,320 tons, and Danzig 25,910.

The non-national ships under construction in foreign yards amount in all to 394,034 tons, whereas British yards, whihc used to be responsible for 80 per cent. of all the ships afloat, have only 64,000 tons of such work in hand. As recently as 1906 this country launched just twice as much tonnage as all other countries combined, but in the first half of 1926 the percentage had fallen to 38.3, from which it has now risen slightly. This is an illustration of the evils resulting from the present economic and financial distress of the world.

So far the British Government has found no way of defending British shipbuilders from such unfair competition which has led to the loss, at least temporarily, of the support of many old customers. At a moderate estimate, the orders for non-national ships filched from this country, using the word filched without offence, represent a sum of about £10,000,000, of which upwards of threequarters would have been spent in wages.

Grau Holds Army Still Rules Cuba

neither harmony nor coordinated effort, due to lack of cooperation among the random groups that combined forces in order to achieve power, without aim, direction, platform principles or proper authority.

Charges Caffery Gives Orders

"Orders issue from the chief of the army (Colonel Batista) which the civil authorities obey, but whose real source, as has often been said, is Mr. Caffery (Jefferson Caffery, United States Ambassador to Cuba.) The army, whose budget has just been increased 30 per cent, with a proportionate decrease in other departments of state, continues to usurp more and more practical functions of government and recently had conferred upon it officially the right to interfere directly in the activities of the Departments of Sanitation, Agriculture and Public Instruction."

Dr. Grau asserted that the solution of the army problem was that "the normal functions of the army must be under strict military discipline." "As an arm of the executive power," he said, "it must be confined absolutely to fulfiling orders of the civil authorities."

The revolutionary leader said that a "supreme constituent assembly" was "indispensable, in order that a Constitution may be drawn that will restore the necessary juridical order."

"Until this preliminary step is taken," he continued, "there can be no constitutional power, notwithstanding the insistence of the present government upon calling the powers they now exercise by that name. The constituent assembly must originate in honest elections, preceded by propaganda in which press and forum are maintained inviolable, with equal rights and equal responsibilities for all citizens without exceptions, and with an electoral mechanism through which the public will can be freely expressed, without coercive measures on the part of those who resort simultaneously to the polls and armed force.

"These conditions naturally and inevitably are conditions precedent to honest elections; yet at present they neither exist in Cuba nor is any expression of opinion on the subject tolerated.

Halted Activity as a Protest

"The Authentic Revolutionary party (Autenticos) was formed to agitate for a constituent assembly, and with this objective we began our political propaganda shortly after my government retired. We ceased this propaganda as a protest against the murder of several individuals who had been arrested and were in the custody of the police; and while our attitude has been attacked as romantic, it is nevertheless certain that if other political groups had supported us in this protest, the practice of systematic murder of political prisoners would probably not have been inaugurated, which has taken so great a toll of lives to date, even to the extent of entire families being dragged from their homes and exterminated by the police.

"Again and again we have demonstrated our eagerness to lead the country to the paths of liberty and peace, but apparently the present administration prefers the existing state of aimlessness and spurious legality.

"Our party is organized throughout the republic, although many of its members are in prison or exile. To gauge its influence over Cuban public opinion, one must traverse the island from end to end, both in the cities and the remotest corners of the provinces, and question the people as to what they think.

"Our program is based on nationalism, or rather the strengthening of the national individuality, combined with generosity and hospitality toward the foreigner, taking care that our native population obtain a decent livelihood in their own country. We propose an equitable distribution of wealth in so far as this does not imply confiscation or social upheaval. We also stand for anti-imperialism, that is to say, freedom in our own people to choose and determine their own destiny."

Baldwin Likely To Quit Public Life Fairly Soon

Domei

LONDON, Sept. 8—Premier Stanley Baldwin's protracted absence from his official duties at a moment of important international developments is now causing some political circles to predict that the Premier plans to retire from the Government at an early date.

According to those sources, Mr. Baldwin is not likely to remain in office more than two or three months. It was added that the Prime Minister has decided to prolong his vacation for another month, although he has already been on vacation for more than that period.

8,500,000 US Workers Find Jobs Since '33

Domei

WASHINGTON, Sept. 7—Speaking over the radio in observance of the 40th anniversary of Labor Day today, Secretary of Labor Frances Perkins estimated that a total of 8,500,000 workers have found jobs since the low point of depression of 1933.

She added that of the total, 5,500,000 workers are engaged in private industry.

The Secretary of Labor further said that payrolls in the durable goods industries had arisen by 32.1 per cent since last year, while employment in these industries had increased by 14.8 per cent.

Church Groups In Reich Fear New Nazi Ban

Catholics, Jews And All Opposition Protestants Await Fall Campaign

Evidence increases that the Nazis are planning a new campaign against "domestic enemies" of the regime to be undertaken after the conclusion of the Olympic games, says Ralph W. Barnes in a Berlin dispatch dated August 8 to the New York Herald Tribune, which continues: Apart from the "Marxists" of all shades of opinion, the "domestic enemies" include all Jews within the Reich, large opposition elements within the German Evangelical Church and almost the whole of the Roman Catholic Church in Germany—the latter as an institution which looks to Rome for guidance.

To other evidence available is to be added to the fact that the leaders in all three camps—the Jews opposition, Protestants and Catholics—are looking to the immediate future with apprehension, fearing that by autumn at the latest the Nazis will apply new measures harmful to their respective organizations. Signs of what is in store for the opposition's Protestants—the adherents of the so-called Confessional movement within the Evangelical Church—are already at hand.

The step taken by Confessional leaders in presenting to Reichsfuehrer Adolf Hitler a 4,000-word memorial replete with caustic criticisms of Nazi precepts and practices caused much irritation among the Nazi leaders, who undertook steps to prevent knowledge of the contents of the document from spreading in Germany.

In a series of raids on offices and homes of Confessional leaders, which began three weeks ago, the secret police confiscated typewriters, duplicating machines and the like and began a close surveillance over printing presses. Printed programs of a series of lectures being given here on the subject of the growth of the Confessional movement have been confiscated, and police agents in plain clothes are attending the lectures. These and other measures are motivated in part by the desire to prevent contact between Confessional leaders and foreign visitors to the Olympic games.

In line with a recent order barring the leadership from employing the term "the provisional administration of the German Evangelical Church," postal authorities have been instructed not to deliver mail addressed to that administration.

The Catholics, on their part, look for new measures directed against Catholic Church schools and youth organizations, and it is a general belief that within the next three years both types of institutions will be completely banned. Already under the decree issued last spring, the Catholics are being forced to liquidate what remain of their workers' associations.

Both Catholic and Protestant leaders note with anxiety that plans are being made for a campaign in the autumn intended to bring all German children within the fold of the Nazi youth organization. Religious leaders of the country point to neo-pagan tenets preached within these youth bodies and express the fear that German children who become members gradually will lose the faith of their fathers.

Cuban Senate Approves Final Amnesty Draft

It Excludes Machado Men And Any Accused Of Gang And Terrorist Activities

After weeks of ironing out disagreements, the joint committee of Congress has made a final draft of the amnesty law. The Senate approved the measure on July 28.

The final draft of the amnesty bill is based almost entirely on the measure introduced last May by Senator Ramon Vasconcelos, of Havana Province, providing amnesty for persons accused of or serving sentences for political and certain social offenses, says the New York Herald Tribune whose Havana despatch of August 1 continues: The bill specifically excludes those sentenced or accused of crimes of terrorism and political gangsterism.

The amnesty is not to be applied to former officials of the Machado regime, sentenced or accused of serious crime, ranging downward from murder. These accusations were lodged in the Sanctions Court, tribunals established expressly to try the crimes of the Machado dictatorship, but which have since been abolished.

Several modifications have been made in the original Vasconcelos bill following President Miguel Mariano Gomez's message to Congress on the amnesty, such as barring terrorists and gangsters from the benefits of the amnesty, but providing for reductions of sentneces of the latter in cases where their crimes did not result in death.

Exclusion of terrorists and gangsters from the amnesty signifies a complete victory for Colonel Fulgencio Batista and other high army officials, who strenuously opposed any measure which would bring about the release of the terrorists.

Although official figures on the number of political prisoners held during the last two years have not been announced, it is estimated that the amnesty will affect at least 1,500, while charges lodged in the Urgency Courts against several hundred others who fled from the country will be dropped automatically.

However, the amnesty bill does not provide for dissolution of the Urgency Courts, which were established to try political and social offenders, nor are any of the emergency laws passed by the provisional governments to stamp out strikes, terrorism, gangsterism and other offenses to be abrogated.

The amnesty measure long has been considered the first step necessary to bring about restoration of political normality to Cuba, as it would mean that leaders of such revolutionary organizations as Dr. Ramon Grau San Martin, former provisional president; Dr. Joaquin Martinez Saenz, leader of the A.B.C., and their followers could return to Cuba with full guarantees.

The Grauista Cuban Revolutionary party, the A. B. C., and other radical revolutionary political groups, however, had demanded a widespread amnesty to include terrorists and gangsters, saying many of the latter had committed crimes as the only means of combating an iron-fisted military dictatorship. How these groups will react to the amnesty bill drafted by the joint Congressional committee is a question. Several weeks ago the A. B. C. announced that none of its members was serving a sentence or had been accused of terrorism and gangsterism.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

Boats And Ships

By the popular usage the word "boat" has come to mean any craft afloat, but the term is used incorrectly. In the strictest sense, "boat" refers only to small craft such as a rowboat, lifeboat, launch, etc. propelled by oars. In the course of time, both popularly and legally, the term "ship" has acquired a wide interpretation. Broadly stated, for purposes of international maritime law and by the Merchants' Shipping Acts of Great Britain (1854, 1894, and 1906) the term "ship" includes every description of vessel used in navigation not propelled by oars.

RARE SPECIES OF HORSE GET GOVERNMENT SUBSIDY

Ushiuma, a kind of horse with no mane and resembling an ox, is an animal found exclusively on Tanegashima, an island in Kagoshima Prefecture, Kyushu. There are at present 11 ushiuma on the island, and the Education Department is giving special protection to them as they are verging on extinction.

Mr. Shichinosuke Tagami, the owner of the 11 ushiuma, is finding it difficult to keep these animals, as an ushiuma costs ¥1,200 a year to feed, and the Education Ministry has decided to give Mr. Tagami a subsidy.

Ushiuma are said to have been brought to Tanegashima from Korea by a lord of Satsuma in the 16th century. There is one ushiuma in the Uyeno Zoo.

PROFITEERS PROFIT FROM ICE FAMINE

Owing to the prolonged hot spell, Tokyo is suffering from a shortage of ice. More than 40 ice factories of the Metropolitan Ice Manufacturers' Association can produce 1,800 tons of ice a day, but the demand surpasses 2,000 tons daily. The price is fixed at ¥11 per ton by the association, but outsiders are reaping a big profit by selling at higher prices.

Your Error

The visitor called at the village library. "May I have the 'Letters of Charles Lamb'?" he inquired.

"You're in the wrong building, Mr. Lamb," said the new clerk pleasantly. "The post office is just across the street."—Toledo Blade.

STAFF CHANGES AT AMERICAN SCHOOL

The thirty-fourth year of the American School in Japan will begin at 9 a.m. Wednesday, September 16. All pupils are requested to appear on that day for registration. The school will be opened only during the morning, and no lunch will be served to day pupils. Beginning Thursday, a full day session will be held and regular lunch will be served.

Four changes have been made in the school staff. Miss Esther Wetzel and Miss Katherine Cretcher come from the Horace Mann School of Winnetka, Illinois, and will have charges of the third and fourth and first and second grades respectively. Miss Wetzel was trained at the Winona State Teachers' College, and Miss Cretcher at the National College of Education. Both have had unusually successful experience as teachers in the primary department, and it is expected that the work of this department will be fully up to the high standard of the past few years.

Mr. Lawrence W. Pearson, who for the past two years has been master in Brent School, Baguio, Philippine Islands, will teach history and French and will coach baseball. He will be accompanied by Mrs. Pearson, who is the daughter of the former Vice-Governor of the Philippine Islands, Joseph R. Hayden, who has returned to his professorship at the University of Michigan. Mr. Pearson is a graduate of Hobart College and has done graduate work at Oxford University and Pennsylvania State College. Mrs. Pearson has just completed a course at the Sorbonne. Mr. and Mrs. Pearson will occupy the apartment on the first floor of the boys' dormitory.

Mr. David M. Heinlein will have charge of the physical training and boys' gymnastics and athletics. He is a graduate of George William's College, Chicago, where he did special work in corrective gymnastics and postural training. He has also made a study of these branches in Europe. In addition to his physical training work, he will teach science and will coach the basketball team. He also hopes to establish a class in archery, of which he is an experienced teacher. Mr. Heinlein will also live in the boys' dormitory.

The two dormitories have been renovated during the summer and several repairs and improvements have been made. The heating plants of both buildings have been thoroughly overhauled and new plumbing has been installed in the boys' dormitory. Both buildings present unusually attractive facilities for student home life.

LEAVES TODAY

Miss Lillian Brown of the Honolulu Advertiser who has spent the last week in Tokyo, left this morning for the Hakone district. She will be there several days and then go to Kyoto, Nara and Kobe.

ARRIVING SOON

Miss Helen Burton, owner of the Camel Bell shop, Peiping, will arrive in Kobe next Sunday en route to the United States on a few months business trip. She will be accompanied by one of her four adopted Chinese daughters. They will go to Kyoto for a day before coming to Tokyo and will sail from Yokohama September 25 on the Empress of Canada. In the United States, Miss Burton will visit her two branch shops, one in Bismark, N. D., and one in Florida. In Tokyo Miss Burton and her adopted daughter, Tsu-yi, will be the guest of Mrs. Ray G. Marshall.

German Peasants Want Peace, Says US Writer

20,000 German settlers. Do you think many Germans will live in tropical Africa?"

Need of Colonies

"Perhaps not; it's true Germans don't like to leave home, but we need colonies for raw materials."

"You say 'no conquest,' but what about the expansion eastward advocated by Hitler and Rosenberg?"

"That will come peacefully through concessions. War is not necessary. Capitalists, mainly Jews, are responsible for strife in the world. The war came because the success of goods 'Made in Germany' aroused jealousy. I was in England before the war and there was a bitter press campaign against Germany—but no German propaganda against Britain."

A younger merchant, who disagreed with the Nazis, notably regarding their attitude to the churches, said that he, like other dissenters on domestic policy, believed that Hitler genuinely sought peace with other nations.

"The white race must face Islam and the Orient and hence must avoid war in Europe in order to be united," he said. "Russia is not interested in the white race as such. It seems to me that Hitler's speeches offer the bases for an agreement by Britain and France with Germany to oppose bolshevism. But Hitler's peace efforts have been hampered by secret propaganda from Moscow."

"It is the doubt about German intentions toward Russia which prevents an agreement with her on the part of Western powers," he was reminded.

"There will be no attack on Russia," he said, "but also no commitment or pact with her."

An elderly resident of Wimpfen, who comes into close daily contact with his fellow-villagers, said that they were very anxious when Hitler marched into the Rhineland in March; that they were reminded of the danger of war by air-defense exercises, held here as everywhere in Germany; that the Nazi party had organized lectures on foreign policy in Wimpfen; but that the local people in general paid little attention to foreign problems and knew little about them.

Totalitarian State

"This is a totalitarian State," he said. "All decisions rest with the leader. The individual German has no say; his opinion does not count. But do you think there is danger of war?"

There was one old patriarch who seemed to have no illusions. "War may come suddenly, through an ultimatum, as it did in 1870, before any one realizes its approach," he said as he smoked his long pipe and slowly mounted the hill from the postoffice to the Marktplatz. "The governments are to blame for keeping peoples apart by tariffs and currency control and propaganda, and preventing them from trading with one another."

These are characteristic samples of the views of Europe and of Germany's relations to it gathered from people of various classes and occupations. They seemed to reflect the hopes and fears of Germans generally, old and young, Nazi and non-Nazi. Some were obviously influenced by official doctrines, others as obviously were not.

There were the recurrent themes of the need of colonies and expansion; the fear of communism; the pride—often real, sometimes assumed—in the stern discipline of the Nazi State ("Fortunately that could not happen here," was the comment often made upon the Frenche strikes); the theory of race supremacy, manifested in concern not only for the Nordic but for the whole white race; the conviction of foreign plots to misrepresent and malign Germany, plots which hamper the efforts for peace.

Present was the belief that Britain is sympathetic to Germany and will not oppose her eastward advance—though it was realized that the demand for colonies places a strain upon Anglo-German relations. Toward France, little bitterness was manifest—only a certain mistrust and impatience. It was Russia that was the villain, even for many who did not swallow official propaganda completely.

"We Don't Want War"

Of the foreign mistrust of the new Germany because of its rearmament and its expansionist aims there seemed to be little comprehension, even among those who criticized the domestic policies of the Nazis. And, above all was the sincere assertion heard dozens of times: "Wir wollen keinen Krieg" ("we don't want war"), and the widespread belief that Hitler, farreaching as his demands are, really hopes to avoid armed conflict.

There is no doubt whatever that Wimpfen-on-the-Neckar desires peace; and, at least in this sense, it is typical of Germany generally. But it is not clearly realized that the mere desire for peace is hardly enough.

65 Blum Measures Enacted Into Law

Parliament Adjourns For The Summer After Setting Record In 10-Week Session

With an all-time record of sixty-five new laws passed in a ten-week session, the French Parliament adjourned for the Summer vacation on August 14. Its last sitting lasted, with interruptions, twenty-three hours.

Many of these sixty-five new laws are of major importance, so that Leon Blum, the high priest of France's new deal, was able to claim that at least he had carried out faithfully a large part of the election promises on which the Popular Front swept to victory last May, says P. J. Philip in the New York Times. His Paris dispatch of August 14 continues:

Among the measures which are now law and have changed the whole social system of France are the forty-hour week, collective bargaining between employers and trade unions, paid vacations, nationalization of armaments manufacture, prolongation of the school age, reform of the statutes of the Bank of France, penalties for fiscal evasion, revision to some degree of taxes, control of prices, formation of a wheat board and the organization of the coal market.

Mr. Blum also claimed that the government's foreign policy as practised at London and Geneva had had good effect, although he admitted that all the difficulties in the foreign field had not been resolved.

Senate and House Argue

He evidently took most pride and pleasure in the fact that the "greatest social movement which has been accomplished since the foundation of the Third Republic has been done without any shedding of blood but by persuasion only."

Most of yesetrday's final sitting of the Chamber and the Senate was taken up in arguments between the two houses over the government's proposed wheat board. Again and again the Senate amended the text which had been approved by the Chamber, but finally, after getting their own way in some minor matters, the Senators abandoned the struggle when Minister of Agriculture Georges Monnet threatened to withdraw the bill if he could not get satisfaction.

Throughout the whole session the Senate has fulfilled its role of conscientious moderation, abstaining from putting any veto on measures such as the nationalization of arms manufacture, reform of the Bank of France and even the wheat board, on the ground that these reforms were demanded by the electorate.

More than once in the Senate, however, as spending bills were being passed, the reminder had been raised that all this must be paid for, and how it is going to be paid for is still unsettled. The government's arguments throughout have been that it was seeking to vitalize the country and that once recovery began the question would be easily settled.

Business Slack Reported

Meanwhile, it has not been, in the opinion of its critics, entirely successful. Instead of improving, business has tended to slacken, during the holiday season at least. There are more shops shut in Paris and more employes on holiday than ever before, but the reason behind this luxury of vacation is not prosperity, but the absence of any buying public.

The government's baby bond issue has not proved to be an enormous success, as was hoped. It has done moderately well, but not well enough. On the other hand the weekly reports of the Bank of France, which enters under new control next week, have been favorable and within the next two months, during which Parliament will be on vacation, it is likely to be revealed whether finance is going to command the situation or be its servant.

One reform on which Vincent Auriol, Minister of Finance, is going to be engaged during vacation is the reorganization of the French taxation system. He has repeatedly claimed that a great many taxes imposed here serve only to increase the cost of living without adding revenue, and he proposes to change this situation without adding to the already heavy burden of the taxpayer.

If he can do that and reform the public bookkeeping he will certainly do much to fortify the position of the Popular Front government and assure its continuance.

For the present, devaluation of the franc as a means of salvation is being kept definitely in the background. Both Socialists and Communists are opposed to it, and if circumstances force it Mr. Blum and Mr. Auriol will be compelled to hand over the direction of affairs to some devaluationist radical whom they would, however, support. That is a possiblity, however, which seems unlikely to happen at least before the reassembly of Parliament toward the end of October.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Miraculous Escape

Konrad Merkhe, a soldier in the 27th regiment, fighting in the Peninsular War in Portugal under the command of the Duke of Wellington deserted in the battle near Coimbra, Portugal, October 1810. He was recaptured by a Portuguese regiment commanded by the English Colonel Wilson, in a raid upon the city, and was ordered shot by the Commander-in-Chief. He was placed before a firing squad and 6 muskets were discharged upon him. By an incredible miracle, all 6 muskets jammed at the same time and Merkhe was shaken but otherwise unharmed. The chances against 6 muskets jamming at the same time are mathematically incalculable. Upon a report being made to Wellington, the latter quashed the court martial proceedings and ordered Markhe reinstated, after the latter pledged that he would henceforth act as an honorable and valiant soldier.

Newfoundland 'Monster' Puffs Blue Vapor At Sea

Newfoundland fishermen told vivid, but unconfirmed tales on August 21 of a sea monster on the West Coast that stuck its head sixty feet out of the water and snorted blue vapor from its nostrils.

Telegrams to the Newfoundland Natural Resources Department earlier this week inspired the stories, says the New York Times. The messages, from fishermen the department did not name, told how the sea monster scared them away from Portauport Harbor.

That day Portauport's sharp-eyed fishermen produced a collective picture of the monster like this: At least 200 feet long and 18 feet in diameter; eyes each as big as an enamel sauce pan and spaced two feet apart; a mane larger than that of any horse; an undulating body that rose in loops above the water and set up such waves that for days no boat dared venture to sea.

A 22-feet fish, believed to be the "monster sea serpent" reported off the Nova Scotia Coast several times in August was the prize of fishermen at Half Island Cove, Nova Scotia, Canada, on August 21. Caught in a trap the day before, the fish was towed in by R. Hendsbee, who estimated that it weighed more than four tons. The liver alone weighed about half a ton. Said to resemble a shark, the fish had white flesh and a large mouth, but no teeth.

Jinrikisha Traffic Case Puzzles Court In Asbury

The influence of the Orient brought wrinkles to the brow of Judge Eugene Capiabanco in Asbury Park, New Jersey, on August 14 when he was called on in police court to decide the case of Edward Newman, 20-year-old New York college student. Newman was charged with operating a jinrikisha through the streets of the city and violating traffic signals.

The defendant, who recently started operation of a fleet of the Oriental vehicles there, was taken into custody as he trotted along Ocean Avenue with a young girl as the fare, says the New York Times. Judge Capiabanco was frankly puzzled as to what law if any, had been violated. After a long search through the statute books the defendant was finally fined $2 for "disregarding the safety of pedestrians."

Social and Personal Notes

STAFF CHANGES AT AMERICAN SCHOOL

The thirty-fourth year of the American School in Japan will begin at 9 a.m. Wednesday, September 16. All pupils are requested to appear on that day for registration. The school will be opened only during the morning, and no lunch will be served to day pupils. Beginning Thursday, a full day session will be held and regular lunch will be served.

Four changes have been made in the school staff. Miss Esther Wetzel and Miss Katherine Cretcher come from the Horace Mann School of Winnetka, Illinois, and will have charges of the third and fourth and first and second grades respectively. Miss Wetzel was trained at the Winona State Teachers' College, and Miss Cretcher at the National College of Education. Both have had unusually successful experience as teachers in the primary department, and it is expected that the work of this department will be fully up to the high standard of the past few years.

Mr. Lawrence W. Pearson, who for the past two years has been master in Brent School, Baguio, Philippine Islands, will teach history and French and will coach baseball. He will be accompanied by Mrs. Pearson, who is the daughter of the former Vice-Governor of the Philippine Islands, Joseph R. Hayden, who has returned to his professorship at the University of Michigan. Mr. Pearson is a graduate of Hobart College and has done graduate work at Oxford University and Pennsylvania State College. Mrs. Pearson has just completed a course at the Sorbonne. Mr. and Mrs. Pearson will occupy the apartment on the first floor of the boys' dormitory.

Mr. David M. Heinlein will have charge of the physical training and boys' gymnastics and athletics. He is a graduate of George William's College, Chicago, where he did special work in corrective gymnastics and postural training. He has also made a study of these branches in Europe. In addition to his physical training work, he will teach science and will coach the basketball team. He also hopes to establish a class in archery, of which he is an experienced teacher. Mr. Heinlein will also live in the boys' dormitory.

The two dormitories have been renovated during the summer and several repairs and improvements have been made. The heating plants of both buildings have been thoroughly overhauled and new plumbing has been installed in the boys' dormitory. Both buildings present unusually attractive facilities for student home life.

LEAVES TODAY

Miss Lillian Brown of the Honolulu Advertiser who has spent the last week in Tokyo, left this morning for the Hakone district. She will be there several days and then go to Kyoto, Nara and Kobe.

ARRIVING SOON

Miss Helen Burton, owner of the Camel Bell shop, Peiping, will arrive in Kobe next Sunday en route to the United States on a few months business trip. She will be accompanied by one of her four adopted Chinese daughters. They will go to Kyoto for a day before coming to Tokyo and will sail from Yokohama September 25 on the Empress of Canada. In the United States, Miss Burton will visit her two branch shops, one in Bismark, N. D., and one in Florida. In Tokyo Miss Burton and her adopted daughter, Tsu-yi, will be the guest of Mrs. Ray G. Marshall.

NO RECEPTION

There will be no official reception at the Mexican Legation on September 16, the Anniversary of Independence of the United States of Mexico.

TO INSPECT MANCHOUKUO

Prince Iyesato Tokugawa, President of the Japan Red Cross Society and former President of the House of Peers, will visit Manchoukuo shortly accompanied by his suite. He will leave Tokyo for Manchoukuo on September 21 and will visit the principal cities.

ONE MAN SHOW

Under the auspices of the Nippon Cultural Federation, an exhibition of handicrafts by Mr. P. Hariharan, Indian artist, will be held at the Nishinoya Art Shop, Miyuki Dori, Ginza from Tuesday to Saturday. Various kinds of wooden wares, pottery, and small decorative art objects will be shown.

REFUSES POST

Mr. Riichiro Kawashima, President of the Kokuga Art Society, who had been appointed a member of the hanging committee of the exhibition of the Department of Education, has resigned from the committee.

CLUB REOPENS

The Kyoraku Art Club which has been closed during the summer, was opened this morning. The first art auction of the autumn season is that of the collection of Mr. T. Sato, which will be opened at its clubhouse, Sukiyabashi, Ginza, on September 14, 15, and 16. Various kinds of Japanese curios and old paintings will be auctioned. The admission will be free.

RETURN FROM RESORT

The Norwegian Minister and Mrs. Koren have returned to Tokyo from Karuizawa.

RETURN TO CITY

Mr. and Mrs. Allan Duvall have returned to their home in the Nagi compound from their summer home in Karuizawa.

CHANGES RESIDENCE

Mr. Stanley Slavens of the American consulate-general has moved to the Fujikura compound where he and Lieutenout Joseph Finnigen are occuying the house vacated by Mr. and Mrs. Charles Hutchinson.

SOCIETY MEETS

A meeting of the Friends of India Society (Indo Koyu-Kai), organized by Mr. Rash Behari Bose, Professor N. Kimura of the Rissho University, and Mr. J. Sano, who spent many years at the International University of Dr. Tagore in India, was held Sunday at the Nakamuraya Restaurant, Shinjuku. It was unanimously resolved to appoint a committe for interesting the Japanese religious and cultural organizations in sending delegates to the Parliament of Religions which will be organized in Calcutta next March in connection with the centenary celebration of Sri Ramarkrishna. More than 40 persons were present, including the representatives of the International Buddhist Society, India Independence League, Greater Asia Independence Society, Kokuryu-Kai (Black Dragon Society), Indo-Japanese Association Buddhist Universities and Buddhist temples.

German Peasants Want Peace, Says US Writer

20,000 German settlers. Do you think many Germans will live in tropical Africa?"

Need of Colonies

"Perhaps not; it's true Germans don't like to leave home, but we need colonies for raw materials."

"You say 'no conquest,' but what about the expansion eastward advocated by Hitler and Rosenberg?"

"That will come peacefully through concessions. War is not necessary. Capitalists, mainly Jews, are responsibla for strife in the world. The war came because the success of goods 'Made in Germany' aroused jealousy. I was in England before the war and there was a bitter press campaign against Germany—but no German propaganda against Britain."

A younger merchant, who disagreed with the Nazis, notably regarding their attitude to the churches, said that he, like other dissenters on domestic policy, believed that Hitler genuinely sought peace with other nations.

"The white race must face Islam and the Orient and hence must avoid war in Europe in order to be united," he said. "Russia is not interested in the white race as such. It seems to me that Hitler's speeches offer the bases for an agreement by Britain and France with Germany to oppose bolshevism. But Hitler's peace efforts have been hampered by secret propaganda from Moscow."

"It is the doubt about German intentions toward Russia which prevents an agreement with her on the part of Western powers," he was reminded.

"There will be no attack on Russia," he said, "but also no commitment or pact with her."

An elderly resident of Wimpfen, who comes into close daily contact with his fellow-villagers, said that they were very anxious when Hitler marched into the Rhineland in March; that they were reminded of the danger of war by air-defense exercises, held here as everywhere in Germany; that the Nazi party had organized lectures on foreign policy in Wimpfen; but that the local people in general paid little attention to foreign problems and knew little about them.

Totalitarian State

"This is a totalitarian State," he said. "All decisions rest with the leader. The individual German has no say; his opinion does not count. But do you think there is danger of war?"

There was one old patriarch who seemed to have no illusions. "War may come suddenly, through an ultimatum, as it did in 1870, before any one realizes its approach," he said as he smoked his long pipe and slowly mounted the hill from the postoffice to the Marktplatz. "The governments are to blame for keeping peoples apart by tariffs and currency control and propaganda, and preventing them from trading with one another."

These are characteristic samples of the views of Europe and of Germany's relations to it gathered from people of various classes and occupations. They seemed to reflect the hopes and fears of Germans generally, old and young, Nazi and non-Nazi. Some were obviously influenced by official doctrines, others as obviously were not.

There were the recurrent themes of the need of colonies and expansion; the fear of communism; the pride—often real, sometimes assumed—in the stern discipline of the Nazi State ("Fortunately that could not happen here," was the comment often made upon the Frenche strikes); the theory of race supremacy, manifested in concern not only for the Nordic but for the whole white race; the conviction of foreign plots to misrepresent and malign Germany, plots which hamper the efforts for peace.

Present was the belief that Britain is sympathetic to Germany and will not oppose her eastward advance—though it was realized that the demand for colonies places a strain upon Anglo-German relations. Toward France, little bitterness was manifest—only a certain mistrust and impatience. It was Russia that was the villain, even for many who did not swallow official propaganda completely.

"We Don't Want War"

Of the foreign mistrust of the new Germany because of its rearmament and its expansionist aims there seemed to be little comprehension, even among those who criticized the domestic policies of the Nazis. And above all was the sincere assertion heard dozens of times: "Wir wollen keinen Krieg" ("we don't want war"), and the widespread belief that Hitler, farreaching as his demands are, really hopes to avoid armed conflict.

There is no doubt whatever that Wimpfen-on-the-Neckar desires peace; and, at least in this sense, it is typical of Germany generally. But it is not clearly realized that the mere desine for peace is hardly enough.

65 Blum Measures Enacted Into Law

Parliament Adjourns For The Summer After Setting Record In 10-Week Session

With an all-time record of sixty-five new laws passed in a ten-week session, the French Parliament adjourned for the Summer vacation on August 14. Its last sitting lasted, with interruptions, twenty-three hours.

Many of these sixty-five new laws are of major importance, so that Leon Blum, the high priest of France's new deal, was able to claim that at least he had carried out faithfully a large part of the election promises on which the Popular Front swept to victory last May, says P. J. Philip in the New York Times. His Paris dispatch of August 14 continues:

Among the measures which are now law and have changed the whole social system of France are the forty-hour week, collective bargaining between employers and trade unions, paid vacations, nationalization of armaments manufacture, prolongation of the school age, reform of the statutes of the Bank of France, penalties for fiscal evasion, revision to some degree of taxes, control of prices, formation of a wheat board and the organization of the coal market.

Mr Blum also claimed that the government's foreign policy as practised at London and Geneva had had good effect, although he admitted that all the difficulties in the foreign field had not been resolved.

Senate and House Argue

He evidently took most pride and pleasure in the fact that the "greatest social movement which has been accomplished since the foundation of the Third Republic has been done without any shedding of blood but by persuasion only."

Most of yesterday's final sitting of the Chamber and the Senate was taken up in arguments between the two houses over the government's proposed wheat board. Again and again the Senate amended the text which had been approved by the Chamber, but finally, after getting their own way in some minor matters, the Senators abandoned the struggle when Minister of Agriculture Georges Monnet threatened to withdraw the bill if he could not get satisfaction.

Throughout the whole session the Senate has fulfilled its role of conscientious moderation, abstaining from putting any veto on measures such as the nationalization of arms manufacture, reform of the Bank of France and even the wheat board, on the ground that these reforms were demanded by the electorate.

More than once in the Senate, however, as spending bills were being passed, the reminder had been raised that all this must be paid for, and how it is going to be paid for is still unsettled. The government's arguments throughout have been that it was seeking to vitalize the country and that once recovery began the question would be easily settled.

Business Slack Reported

Meanwhile, it has not been, in the opinion of its critics, entirely successful. Instead of improving, business has tended to slacken, during the holiday season at least. There are more shops shut in Paris and more employes on holiday than ever before, but the reason behind this luxury of vacation is not prosperity, but the absence of any buying public.

The government's baby bond issue has not proved to be an enormous success, as was hoped. It has done moderately well, but not well enough. On the other hand the weekly reports of the Bank of France, which enters under new control next week, have been favorable and within the next two months, during which Parliament will be on vacation, it is likely to be revealed whether finance is going to command the situation or be its servant.

One reform on which Vincent Auriol, Minister of Finance, is going to be engaged during vacation is the reorganization of the French taxation system. He has repeatedly claimed that a great many taxes imposed here serve only to increase the cost of living without adding revenue, and he proposes to change this situation without adding to the already heavy burden of the taxpayer.

If he can do that and reform the public bookkeeping he will certainly do much to fortify the position of the Popular Front government and assure its continuance.

For the present, devaluation of the franc as a means of salvation is being kept definitely in the background. Both Socialists and Communists are opposed to it, and if circumstances force it Mr. Blum and Mr. Auriol will be compelled to hand over the direction of affairs to some devaluationist radical whom they would, however, support. That is a possibility, however, which seems unlikely to happen at least before the reassembly of Parliament toward the end of October.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Miraculous Escape

Konrad Merkhe, a soldier in the 27th regiment, fighting in the Peninsular War in Portugal under the command of the Duke of Wellington deserted in the battle near Coimbra, Portugal, October 1810. He was recaptured by a Portuguese regiment commanded by the English Colonel Wilson, in a raid upon the city, and was ordered shot by the Commander-in-Chief. He was placed before a firing squad, and 6 muskets were discharged upon him. By an incredible miracle, all 6 muskets jammed at the same time and Merkhe was shaken but otherwise unharmed. The chances against 6 muskets jamming at the same time are mathematically incalculable. Upon a report being made to Wellington, the latter quashed the court martial proceedings and ordered Markhe reinstated, after the latter pledged that he would henceforth act as an honorable and valiant soldier.

Newfoundland 'Monster' Puffs Blue Vapor At Sea

Newfoundland fishermen told vivid, but unconfirmed tales on August 21 of a sea monster on the West Coast that stuck its head sixty feet out of the water and snorted blue vapor from its nostrils.

Telegrams to the Newfoundland Natural Resources Department earlier this week inspired the stories, says the New York Times. The messages, from fishermen the department did not name, told how the sea monster scared them away from Portauport Harbor.

That day Portauport's sharp-eyed fishermen produced a collective picture of the monster like this: At least 200 feet long and 18 feet in diameter; eyes each as big as an enamel sauce pan and spaced two feet apart; a mane larger than that of any horse; an undulating body that rose in loops above the water and set up such waves that for days no boat dared venture to sea.

A 22-feet fish, believed to be the "monster sea serpent" reported off the Nova Scotia Coast several times in August was the prize of fishermen at Half Island Cove, Nova Scotia, Canada, on August 21. Caught in a trap the day before, the fish was towed in by R. Hendsbee, who estimated that it weighed more than four tons. The liver alone weighed about half a ton. Said to resemble a shark, the fish had white flesh and a large mouth, but no teeth.

Jinrikisha Traffic Case Puzzles Court In Asbury

The influence of the Orient brought wrinkles to the brow of Judge Eugene Caplabanco in Asbury Park, New Jersey, on August 14 when he was called on in police court to decide the case of Edward Newman, 20-year-old New York college student. Newman was charged with operating a jinrikisha through the streets of the city and violating traffic signals.

The defendant, who recently started operation of a fleet of the Oriental vehicles there, was taken into custody as he trotted along Ocean Avenue with a young girl as the fare, says the New York Times. Judge Capiabanco was frankly puzzled as to what law if any, had been violated. After a long search through the statute books the defendant was finally fined $2 for "disregarding the safety of pedestrians."

nomic security during the year, Mr. Winant placed first the fact that almost 8,000,000 employed men and women already had come under the protection of unemployment compensation laws in sixteen states. He estimated workers covered by these laws constituted approximately 45 per cent of the industrial workers who ultimately might be protected by provisions of the Federal act.

"From all indicatoins," Mr. Winant said, "unemployment compensation laws will be passed in a considerable number of additional states during the coming twelve months. With 1937 a 'legislative year' in which Legislatures in nearly all states will meet, fourteen states are already considering the introduction of such laws.

"These states would include Arkansas, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Kentucky, Maine, Maryland, Michigan, North Carolina, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Texas and West Virginia."

Laws Passed in Thirty-eight States

Mr. Winant noted that thirty-eight states had passed laws providing aid to aged, the blind and orphaned or otherwise dependent children.

"Relatively few people," he said, "realize that the United States is the last industrial country to invoke a social security program on a nation-wide basis. This gives us an opportunity to draw on the experience of others and at the same time to develop a program of our own.

"I hope that the good sense, the technical knowledge and the kindly understanding which initiated this program of social justice may be successfully carried through the administration of the act. Time alone can perfect it."

Lamont Minimizes The Danger Of War

West or on the East.

"In calling off sanctions the British Government stated that it preferred not to attempt something that proved plainly ineffective, and that it could not render effective without serious risk of war. And its second thought, too, seemed to be that if—the main object remaining unachieved—sanctions were indefinitely continued, Italy would be lost as one factor for the maintenance of European peace in the event that trouble came up from some other quarter."

New Locarno Parley Planned

"With the raising of sanctions," he said, "there has seemed to come a vigorous revival of efforts for appeasement. This is evident on many sides. The inspired Italian press is encouraging a renewal of Italy's traditional friendly relations with Great Britain. The British have withdrawn in good part their Mediterranean fleet in response to the Italian gesture, and they have supported France in various Continental moves for better understanding, such as Locarno and neutrality toward Spain.

"Germany and Italy have accepted invitations to a renewed Locarno conference. Not least important have been concessions made by Great Britain on concluding a new treaty of amity with Egypt.

"As to the League of Nations, there is every disposition to try to build for the future. Its leading members recognize philosophically even though with regret and some humiliation, that you cannot have collective action if many of the great powers are collectively not present. This business of attempting to boycott, coerce and punish whole nations of scores of millions of proud peoples may have read well on paper, but to make it even half way work against a major power requires practical unanimity among all the other great nations of the earth. And that does not seem attainable.

Does Not Speak as Expert

"It is easy for us in America, happily secure from foreign aggression, safe in our own enormous resources, to criticize the peoples of the Old World and to say that their statesmanship had gone bankrupt. But, as I have indicated, I am not prepared to adopt such a view."

Mr. Lamont emphasized that he did not speak as an expert, and could only give his impressions of what he had seen and been told. He might be too optimistic, he admitted, but he did not think so.

"I may be too much influenced by my horror of war and my hope of peace. But I do hope and trust and believe that Europe will keep the peace."

Asked to comment upon the Spanish situation, Mr Lamont said that it was "far too clouded to enable any one to speak with real knowledge of what is going on, or with certainty of what issues are involved."

Mr. Lamont's remarks are expected to attract great interest in political and financial circles here and abroad. There will be conjecture in Wall Street as to what impelled him to depart from the rigid rule of the great banking house against formal interviews. Additional interest is lent to the banker's statements in view of the prominent role he played in the recent investigation by Senator Nye's Munitions Committee.

At that time Mr. Lamont and his colleagues vigorously defended themselves against charges that the "international bankers" had entangled this country in the last European war by a web of financial transactions which bound the material interests of the country to the Allied side and made continued neutrality impossible.

Mr. Lamont excused himself from discussing financial affairs in yesterday's interview which, he characterized as already "too long." He remarked that his holiday in South Africa had been "perfect," relating that much of his time had been spent with General Smuts, visiting him and his family on his farm in the Transvaal, motoring with him through the Kruger National Preserve and then going by air north to the Victoria Falls of the Zambesi.

USSR Accused Of Aiding Bandits In Border Areas

3,000 Communist Outlaws On Soviet-Manchu Frontier Planning Regiment

Domei

HSINKING, Sept. 12—Sensational revelations that some 3,000 Communist bandits including Manchoukuo and Korean irregulars are infesting the eastern Soviet-Manchoukuo frontier area with the help of Soviet authorities, were made in informed quarters here today.

According to those quarters, the large number of anti-Japanese-Manchoukuo bandits have recently removed from the wooded region around Frontier Post No. 21 on the eastern Soviet-Manchoukuo border to Atamanovka in the Soviet territory allegedly with the connivance of the Soviet authorities.

Apparently securing an understanding from the Soviet frontier forces, it is further reported, the groups of irregulars reportedly numbering some 3,000 men altogether, have been establishing themselves in the eastern Soviet-Manchoukuo frontier. Various sorts of facilities including building lots and materials are reported to have been afforded by the Soviet authorities.

'Bandit Regiment' Planned

The area surrounding Frontier Mark No. 21 is stated to be still swarming with outlaws belonging to the old "Northern Militia Corps." These bandits are reportedly under the joint command of Wu I-cheng, Chang Yu-tin, Chai Shih-ying, Min Hsien-jen and Liu San-chiu. Close contact is reported to have been being maintained between these irregulars and those at Atamanovka. It is also reported that they have been planning to organize a "bandit regiment."

The reports also indicate that Kung Hsien-ying, a leading figure of the anti-Japanese-Manchoukuoan bandit forces in eastern Manchuria, has recently been sent to Nanking with a view to enlisting influential "combatants" for subversive moves in the new State.

Aim To Disturb Peace

Commenting on the reports of alleged assistance by the Soviet authorities to bandits in the eastern frontier area, informed military quarters here express the fear that following consolidation of their armed position, these irregulars, availing themselves of the natural fastnesses in the area around Frontier Post No. 21, will indulge in serious maneuvers to disturb the peace and order of Manchoukuo.

They add that in case of emergency there are indications that these outlaws will act as a separate column of the "Red Army." The Japanese and Manchoukuo authorities here are understood to be keeping a close watch on the developments of the frontier situation.

The Shortest River

Among the many interesting limestone springs of Florida, is one that has most unusual characteristics. It is the Falmouth Springs, flowing 60,000 gallons of water per minute, located ten miles from the city of Live Oak in Suwance County. This spring forms river that is not only the shortest known river but reverses its ng forms a river that is not only the spring emerges and flows as an open stream for 900 feet, where it abruptly sinks beneath the surface to reappear again in the Suwance River at Ellaville, three miles distant. During periods of excessive rainfall and high stages of the Suwance, the flow is reversed toward the spring.

Boulder Dam Lake Cools Air For Over 100 Miles

Airplane pilots who fly over Boulder Dam each day on transcontinental trips say that the lake created by the dam is slowly changing the climate of Southern Nevada and Northeastern California.

The pilots report that instruments in their ships show that the water backed up behind the concrete horseshoe on the Colorado River is cooling the air for miles around, according to the New York Times.

When ground temperatures at Las Vegas were 115 degrees, the lake surface temperature was 105 and the reading at 12,000 feet was 50 degrees.

This mass of cooler air spread like an open umbrella, L. G. Fritz, operations superintendent of the Transcontinental and Western air line, declared in reporting the pilots' findings.

Mr. Fritz said the lake, which is 100 miles long, was "acting as a charging battery" in the cooling process.

Bear Chases Prospector Into Rich Nickel Deposit

An angry bear which frightened Findlay McCallum, Winnipeg prospector, from the scene of his operations to a point of refuge led to the discovery of what is believed to be the richest nickel deposit since discovery of the big Sudbury field, in the early 1900s.

It was after weeks of fruitless prospecting, he reported, when he was confronted by a decidedly unfriendly bear, according to the New York Herald Tribune, whose August 8 dispatch from Winnipeg, Canada, continues:

Dropping his equipment, he retreated to a near-by point of safety. While awaiting the departure of the bear from the place where he had been working, McCallum discovered some interesting stones.

McCallum reclaimed his abandoned implements and went to work. He interested Fraser Reid, manager of Conigas Mine, to the extent that Reid financed additional exploration.

The nickel deposit now has been uncovered for more than 1,000 feet and ranges from 175 feet to 200 feet in width. Assays indicate a nickel content from 1½ to 5 per cent and smaller values in gold and copper.

A magnetic needle has indicated extension of the field another 1,000 feet beyond the uncovered portion, giving a known length to the vein of 2,000 feet.

Irish Army Formed To Aid The Rebels

O'Duffy To Lead Brigade As A Christian Crusade Against Popular Front Regime

General Owens O'Duffy, former leader of the Cosgrave party and now chief of the Blueshirts, has started a dramatic re-entry into public life in Dublin, Ireland, as the leader of the crusade against the Spanish Popular Front.

Following a recent visit to the Continent, General O'Duffy made a whirlwind tour of the Irish Free State and this week-end announced the formation of an Irish volunteer brigade to go forth as crusaders to fight for Christianity on the Spanish frontier, says a Dublin dispatch dated August 23 to the New York Times. It continues:

General O'Duffy says he has taken this action in response to an appeal from the Spanish insurgent leaders. He claims to have already applications from 2,000 young men anxious to take up arms against Spanish Government forces, while large numbers of doctors, nurses and medical students, he says, have volunteered for Red Cross work.

"Within a fortnight," General O'Duffy said to this correspondent today, "we hope to be able to send our first hospital unit to Spain. I have taken this action in response to a widespread appeal from all sections of our people without distinction of class creed or political opinion."

"This crusade has been begun to assist the persecuted people of Spain in their life-and-death struggle for Christianity. We are opening a fund for the purpose of maintaining and equipping field ambulance units and a volunteer brigade on Spanish soil."

Many Protestants Included

Of the 2,000 who have already volunteered, General O'Duffy mentioned that almost half are from Irish residents in Britain and Northern Ireland. He stressed the fact that a large proportion of Northerners were Protestants who viewed the prospects of an anti-Christian victory in Spain with alarm.

General O'Duffy does not propose to arm and equip members of his brigade leaving Ireland. He will give them distinctive badges and they will join the insurgents as a sort of foreign legion, the arms and equipment to be provided by the Spanish insurgent army.

When reminded that the Free State Government had subscribed to the non-intervention pact, General O'Duffy said he did not see why the government here should stand by the French pact, which he described as the biggest hoax ever imposed on the nations of Europe.

"I know from reports received here that French Communists are pouring into Spain with full military equipment," he said. "Russia is shipping arms wholesale and recently Communists in Mexico shipped 50,000 rifles and ammunition to the Spanish Reds. Then the Communists in Britain and Northern Ireland have started funds to support the Reds.

"In view of these facts, our Catholic Irish government can scarcely intervene to prevent assistance being given General Francisco Franco's army in Spain in its fight for Christianity. All over Ireland today public bodies are calling on the government here to sever diplomatic relations with Spain.

"Without delay President de Valera should hand the Spanish Minister in Dublin his papers and tell him to quit the country. All trade relations with Spain should also be broken off."

Transport Plans Complete

Transport plans were complete, General O'Duffy explained, for shipping the first Irish brigade of 1,000 to Spain.

"And I will be one of the first on the boat," he added.

A government victory in Spain would be followed by civil war in France, which, General O'Duffy declared, is on the brink of a precipice.

"With Spain and France gone Communist," he said, "Ireland will follow next. I believe a most deadly blow to Communists here will be dealt by smashing communism on the Spanish front. The success of General Franco's armies is of vital importance to the whole Christian world."

Concurrently with General O'Duffy's move, Patrick Belton, chairman of the Dublin County Council; Dr. Brennan, Dublin County Coroner; Alec McCabe and other public men have launched an organization called the Irish Christian Front to arouse public opinion on the Spanish situation and to the dangers of communism here. They plan to hold a big demonstration on College Green, Dublin, next Sunday.

In their appeal issued today they said: "Our efforts are made to awaken the Irish people to a sense of danger of our horizon and emphasize that if the barbaric horde that fired churches in Spain succeed no human effort on our part can save Ireland from the same kind of fate."

Spanish Woman Red Beauty Is Hailed As Messiah By Workers

Information reaching the French border bears out previous reports that a woman, known throughout Spain as La Passionaria, is playing a major role in the War Ministry in Madrid. She is regarded as a messiah by the workers, whom she has championed since her entry into politics ten years ago.

Not hesitating to shoulder and shoot a gun herself, La Passionaria has been setting the example for Spain's laboring women, who for the last two weeks have constituted 10 per cent of the republican armed forces, according to a dispatch to the New York Times from Hendaye, France, on August 1. The report continues:

The real name of La Passionaria, who is an implacable revolutionist and a Communist Deputy in the Cortes from a miners' district in Biscaya, is Dolores Ibarreri. She was renamed "Passion Flower" by the masses to symbolize her beauty, oratory and passion for justice.

Forty-one years old, La Passionaria is no haggard-looking female of the French Revolution type. Even among her enemies she is noted as a dark-eyed, jet-haired Spanish beauty. Her first ambition, to become a school teacher, was thwarted by lack of adequate means, and she finished her education with a self-planned curriculum of Marx, Engels and Lenin.

A laundress in a small mining town, she soon came to sympathize with the miners' plight and took a fighting part in all strikes. During the dictatorship of Primo de Rivera she and her husband, the Communist Mayor of Somorrostro, spent most of the time in prison. After the Socialist revolution in February, 1934, their home in Asturias was completely destroyed and they went to Russia.

Known to the Soviet as Dolores, La Passionaria was named last Winter to the executive committee of the seventh congress of the Third International, at one of whose meetings she presided.

As an example of her bravery her followers like to cite her behavior in freeing prisoners from a jail after the general amnesty last February. The Civil Guards and the Assault Guards were still faithful to the previous reactionary government and would not allow the prisoners to join their families and friends eagerly waiting outside the walls.

Having succeeded in opening the iron gates, the imprisoned men were held in only by the guns of the guards, who threatened to shoot any one making a break.

After a vain attempt to get the cooperation of the local Governor, La Passionaria suddenly climbed the iron grillwork of the prison gate, defying the guards to shoot through at her, and exhorted the prisoners to escape, which they did.

Observers on the French border, including Spanish refugees, who know La Passionaria well, say that she is not interested in communism just now and is fighting wholeheartedly for the republic against fascism. If the government forces win, however, it is hard to see how any new Cabinet could be formed without her approval and cooperation.

ICC Bars Change In Chicago's Time

Order Refuses To Admit That City Within Eastern Zone Despite Local Law

The American Interstate Commerce Commission on August 21 refused to permit Chicago to be included in the Eastern standard time zone. At the same time it did move the zone boundary westward from Detroit to the shores of Lake Michigan, says the New York Times.

To change the Chicago time, the commission said, would do violence to the standards laid down by Congress and would be beyond the commission's power.

"If Chicago is to be included in the Eastern zone, then the Mississippi River presents the only logical boundary line," said the commission order in denying the request of Chicago.

Chicago, through a 44-to-3 vote of her City Council last November, fixed Eastern standard time for transaction of city business. Incidentally, the proponents of the change said they desired to eliminate daylight-saving time, now used in the Summer. Later a formal petition to extend the Eastern zone was filed with the I. C. C.

Sees Confusion in Change

The commission's report asserted that Eastern standard time at Chicago would bring confusion and danger to the railroads, and added that outside of the Chicago area there was no showing of public sentiment for the change. One of the commission's statements was:

"As has been repeatedly pointed out in our reports in this proceeding, the fixation of standards of time cannot be left to the individual States or to their subordinate municipal agencies, except to the cost of complete lack of uniformity, and the shifting about of time standards to suit the supposed needs of individual States or communities, either the year round or for the Summer months, compels neighboring, less powerful States, to yield their equal rights of sovereignty and to concede to the powerful community the domination over time standards regardless of the effect upon neighboring communities or States, with no respect for their desires, and heedless of the effect upon operations in interstate commerce or the laws of the United States governing interstate carriers and government officers.

"The present record makes it clear that the enormous population of Chicago, the second city in size in the nation, and the importance of its commerce, have extended the effect of its municipal ordinances into many other communities in the State of Illinois and in the neighboring States of Indiana and Wisconsin against the statutes and counter to the expressed desires of the peoples of those States."

Legislators Opposed Change

After the Chicago City Council passed the Eastern standard time ordinance, effective last March 1, the Illinois House of Representatives asked the commission not to make the change sought by Chicago.

Remarking that Chicago has a population of about 3,500,000, with another 1,000,000 in the surrounding area, the commission said that proponents of the change urged the importance of industrial, financial and commercial connection with the East. But the commission answered:

"It is not here apparent that a parity of time with financial and industrial connections to the east of Chicago would be of any greater importance to the convenience of commerce, taken as a whole, than is the existing uniformity of time between Chicago and the agricultural and commercial sections in the Middle West."

The "confusion" that would result from operation of railroads on Central time, with Eastern time in Chicago, obtains under daylight-saving but this cannot be helped in the present state of the law, the commission said.

Effect on Railroads Feared

Chicago Live Stock and Grain Exchanges "opposed the time change because of its adverse effect upon Chicago as a market for these commodities," the report continued.

Describing the Chicago district as the largest railroad terminal in the world, the commission said:

"From a railroad operating standpoint the placing of the zone boundary through or near this immense terminal would be fraught with incalculable and unavoidable difficulty and danger."

"The proposed westward movement of the time zone boundary to a point beyond Chicago is objected to as being too radical a departure from solar time and too remote from the governing time meridian to come within the reasonable intendment of the Standard Time Act," was another statement.

Readjustment of the time zone for the lower Michigan peninsula was in accordance with a plea by a region which has already used this time successfully.

Scotch Joke

The following story is about a certain Scotchman who returned to his native land after a thirty-year absence. Preparatory to his leaving America he wrote and asked his brothers to meet him at the station, and upon his arrival at the home town was met by two bearded men whom he had difficulty in recognizing.

"Why the beards?" he asked.

England's Economic Situation Favorable

of primary commodity prices. Wholesale prices during the past year have risen by 7 per cent., retail prices by 3 per cent., while the level of real wages in this country is now higher than at any time since the early part of 1929. This rising trend of prices must, of course, make for larger profits. It is increasing the natural rate of profitability, and thus tends to widen the scope and scale to which private enterprise is ready to function.

So far, so good. It is, however quite evident that much of the present stimulation of activity is decidedly artificial, though it need not become dangerous so long as its reactions are kept in check. The activity which results from the expansionist policy of the Government does not provide a permanent basis for the functioning of our economic life. The process of rearmament is essentially uneconomic. It cannot continue for ever. The same is true of all the ancillary activities which go with rearmament. For example, it holds good of the housing, the provision of public utility services, of amusements, shops, luxuries, etc., that accompany the establishment of new armament factories and the extension of existing plants. If these plants become obsolete, the ancillary trades will obviously suffer with the center round which they have grown. That is a definite danger which is apparent not merely in the direct and visible efforts which are being made to extend industrial plants in order to catch up arrears in our armament structure, but also in the indirect repercussions of the rearmament program on the general industrial structure of this country—as, for example, in the extensions which may be made to our iron and steel plants.

Long-Term Problems

Those who visualize this essentially domestic and partly uneconomic expansion of industrial activity with equanimity, do so in the hope that when this movement has spent its force, in the form in which it now reflects itself, something else will take its place. The hope is that either expansionism will continue and find expression in different directions, for example, in more extensive slum clearance, or else that a revival of world trade will by then have occurred to take the place of a lagging self-contained recovery. These, however, are essentially long-term problems. They are doubtless giving the Government a due measure of concern. But they do not alter the fact that for the easily foreseeable future, the economic barometer is definitely set fair. It is being fixed at this mark not merely by the direct impulse which our official policy is giving to industrial activity, but also by the underlying monetary and credit policy which is being pursued in order to keep the machinery of expansion thoroughly well lubricated. This easy and cheap-money policy has been particularly apparent during the present year. It finds its clearest expression in the exceptional growth that has occurred in the gold holding of the Bank of England. In other words, the position is being prepared for enabling the banking system to take up an appreciable increase in the amount of Treasury bills—the inevitable counterpart of the policy of expansion which the Government is furthering. It should of course be realized that the danger of setting up economic disequilibrium and of preparing the way for relapse and depression is enhanced rather than diminished by this easy money policy. Avoidance of friction makes it easy for the economic machine to travel on the wrong as well as on the right road. For that very reason the responsibilities of our financial authorities in Whitehall and Threadneedle Street are correspondingly increased. They are certainly greater today and they are more difficult to appraise than when a semi-automatic gold standard showed the red light of danger whenever unorthodoxy or expansion tended to step beyond the bounds of caution. If the authorities do not wish to resort to the admittedly clumsy weapon of indiscriminate credit restriction, they will have to use more subtle weapons of control. They will have to watch for the first sign of unhealthy stimulation of activity in any particular direction, of undue profit inflation, of evident and unhealthy disparity in price movements, and if they discern evidence of dangerous developments, they will have to use more selective weapons than credit restriction, which hits everyone indiscriminately. This can only mean increased interference in the private affairs of individual industries. Part of the price we must pay for the expansionist policy of the State is inevitably a growth of State interference, and a further departure from the hallowed principles of laissez-faire. That trend will offend many traditions and principles; but it cannot be objected to in the present age.

NY Mayor Scorns Ricksha Racing

of five miles apiece.

Not a Sport, Mayor Says

Milford G. Farley, City Manager of Asbury Park, sent an invitation to Mayor La Guardia. The New York Mayor sent the following reply:

August 14 1936.

Honorable Milford G. Farley, City Manager,
Asbury Park, N. JJ.

My dear Mr. Farley:

I have your kind invitation to start the ricksha relay race from City Hall, New York, to the Convention Hall in Asbury Park. I appreciate your thoughtfulness and the friendly spirit which prompted it.

"I beg to be excused from participating, for the reason that I do not believe that a rickshaw race can be classified as a sport, or even as an athletic contest. Quite the contrary is true. It is not only symbolic, but actually characteristic of human exploitation and slavery.

God Almighty gave men horses for transportation and also brains to devise locomotives, motors and airplanes. The very idea of one human being trudging along as a beast of burden, dragging another who sits under shade in a comfortable seat is repulsive to me and contrary to everything for which our country stands.

"With kind personal regards, I am

Sincerely yours,
F. H. LA GUARDIA,
Mayor.

In commenting on his letter the Mayor emphasized that rickshaw rides would not be a feature of the New York World's Fair in 1939.

When informed of the Mayor's attitude the college boys Summering at Asbury Park seemed a little perplexed.

"Maybe it would be degrading as a regular profession," one remarked. "But we'd never get any exercise if we spent our Summers riding in trains or automobiles or airplanes."

City Manager Farley was not at his home in Asbury last night to comment on the Mayor's reply. But if the feeling of the college boys has any influence they will run the ricksha race anyway.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

Wrestling Coach Who Never Wrestled

Dean of American college mat tutors, Edward Clark Gallagher, 49-year-old wrestling coach and director of physical education at Oklahoma A. and M. College, was a track and football star in his undergraduate days, lettering in both sports—but he has never wrestled. Enrolling in the school of engineering in 1904, Gallagher graduated in 1909 with a degree in electrical engineering. His studies in statics, kinematics and mechanics convinced him that the same principles of leverages could be applied to the human body, particularly to the sport of wrestling. That became his career, and apparently his convictions are correct. Out of 117 matches, his teams have won 110—losing 4 and tieing 3.

Story Of A Bottle

Four thousand miles in 15 months was the drifting record of a corked bottle tossed into the Grays Harbor, Washington flood-waters of 1933 by Victor Olson. Olson placed a message in the bottle before setting it adrift in the water that lapped against the front porch of his home. 15 months later the message was returned by Walter Harms from Balboa, Panama Canal Zone, who picked up the bottle as it bobbed along in the surf.

only to keep her army fit and ready for all developments.

Crown Prince to Head Army

In the maneuvers the Crown Prince Umberto will direct the Blue army in its clash with the Red forces. All military attaches stationed in Rome will attend the maneuvers.

Demobilization of the army class of 1914 (men born in that year), ordered several days ago by the War Ministry, will free from military service some 120,000 men, many of whom fought in Ethiopia. The class was called to colors just before the Ethiopian war.

According to an official communique, two divisions of Italian soldiers already have returned from Ethiopia and one from Libya. Another division of the regular army and a division of the Black Shirt Fascist militia are on their way home from East Africa and two more will return soon. The return of these divisions will bring to 90,000 the number of soldiers repatriated from East Africa, where as many as 400,000 were gathered at one time. Fresh forces, mostly volunteers to settle the new Italian colony, are expected to replace those leaving Ethiopia.

At Napoleon's Shrine

Premier Benito Mussolini, in meditative silence, visited the shrine of Napoleon and then ordered new memorials to his acknowledged hero. He devoted most of his pilgrimage to reflection over the Napoleonic relics. He was accompanied by Lieutenant General Achille Starace, secretary of the Fascist party, and Giuseppe Valle, Under Secretary of Aviation.

Mussolini browsed in the Villa San Martino, the home Napoleon had built for himself during his first exile. He made a careful study of the completed restoration of the home, which he ordered four years ago. He made few comments, as he wandered through the residence, lost in reflection. Before he went away he ordered that it be transformed into a Napoleonic museum.

Later Il Duce went to Porto Ferrajo, the island's main city, to see more Napoleonic memorabilia. He examined the relics with great care.

play a larger part in our national building program and whether it should not include the building of low-cost homes which would not be profitable for private enterprise.

Cost Is Under 1929 Level

"In spite of increased prices of building materials, the cost of building today is 22 per cent below the 1929 level. Costs have been lowered chiefly by improved efficiency and reduced prices of materials. Union wage standards have largely been preserved — a wholesome development."

"With rents and values rising," the federation continued, "mortgage money cheaper and easier to get, costs still well below pre-depression levels and a serious shortage of housing, a high level of private building is in prospect for the next two or three years. Some have even predicted a building boom. Home building is now taking the lead in revival, with factory building lagging because of excess capacity built in 1929.

Over 6,000 Rooms Ready

Domei

JOHANNESBURG.—Estimates as to the number of rooms available for visitors in private houses during the Empire Exhibition at Johannesburg have already been far surpassed. The number now available exceeds 6,000.

Mr. J. H. Crocker, Director of Publicity, for Johannesburg, in an interview, said that the rooms were good, comfortable and clean. Inferior accommodation, such as was offered by some persons, including badly-ventilated or insufficiently clean premises, had been politely declined.

The Bureau is handling enormous numbers of letters from intending visitors to the Empire Exhibition who are already booking accommodation.

Madrid Folks At Mercy Of Events

the Military Hospital, Colonel Doleito, a staunch Republican officer, had been summoned to give the prisoner to the people, but had refused to do so withiut a regular order from a magistrate or the police. Subsequently, as the colonel, accompanied by Dr. Gomez Ulla, the well-known surgeon, was motoring from Carabanchel to Madrid, the former was seized by armed men, taken away, and shot. It does not seem that after this outrage any special precautions were taken to guard General Lopez Ochoa.

On August 16 two bodies were found together at the end of a residential street. One was of a girl of 22 or thereabouts, the other of a man who, under civilian garb, wore a monks' rope girdle.

These are only items of an appalling list. The state of affairs is notorious. A lift girl in the intervals of her duty casually described to an acquaintance and others how she had seen an "execution."

Many people visit the morgue for diverse reasons. Among those yesterday was an aged woman who appeared discontented. "It goes badly, there are less than 40 here today" she mumbled, jerking her thumb expressively over her shoulder. An unknown descendant of the tricoteuses of 1789, she was consoled on being told that by no means all the dead found their way to the morgue.

The murder in cold blood of the trainload of prisoners from Jaen, the first collective crime in Madrid, perpetrated near Vallecas, was followed by murders in the Model Prison. The Marxist Militia got past the prison guard on the pretext that the warders were favoring the Fascists in their charge, passing out letters to their friends, and permitting them to make plans among themselves. The method alleged to be employed was to write a message on cigarette paper, roll it into a tiny ball within chocolate tin-foil, and insert it in bits of potato. The potatoes were distributed to the addressees in the midday stew. The noise of shots from inside the prison could be heard during the night and early morning. The following afternoon smoke could be seen arising from one of the courtyards accompanied by a fusillade. All round the prison were crowds of Militia and some police forces, the latter passive, for there was no disorder outside. The night in Madrid was unusually quiet. Before dark the fire in the prison, stated to have broken out in a wood pile and in the bakery, was overcome by the fire brigade.

About midnight, along the quiet streets whence the children of Madrid had retired after their evening play, a furtive procession wound its way towards the British Embassy and a small commission begged to speak to the Counsellor. They were admitted. It was a deputation of Republicans and Socialists come to beg the British Ambassador, an official still in high repute with most Spaniards, to intervene for the sake of humanity to prevent the massacre of prisoners. The Charge d'Affaires, Mr. Ogilvie-Forbes, who since his recent arrival was described prominently in the Madrid Press as "the new British Ambassador," then took a highly responsible, but, in the circumstances, humanely unavoidable action. He ordered his car and proceeded immediately to the battle headquarters of the Cabinet established in the Ministry of Marine, a stone edifice opposite the Bank of Spain and next door to the G.P.O. where the Prime Minister and the Foreign Minister sleep behind sandbagged protection at the gates. The representative of the British Government was immediately admitted.

What passed at the interview will in due course fill an interesting page in history. It has not transpired, but events will soon show whether the Government can retrieve a rapidly slipping situation or are impotent. The cleavage between the unions, which some consider inevitable, may now manifest itself. If it can be prevented, there is just a chance that the Republic may be saved from foundering. The coming week may well be critical.

Salt For Japan

Domei

PEIPING, Sept. 4—Seventy thousands tons of salt will be exported from the Changlu salt district to Japan this year as the result of an agreement signed between a Chinese salt company and a buying agency jointly organized by the Mitsubishi Company and the Iwai Company, according to Chinese reports from Tientsin.

The agreement has been approved by the Changlu Salt Inspectorate and the first shipment of salt will leave for Japan about the middle of this month. The agreement fixes the price of salt per ton at $2.60. For every ton exported a tax of $1 will be paid by the Japanese party to the agreement.

It is stated that the Changlu Salt Inspectorate has telegraphed to the Ministry of Finance in Nanking, requesting it to instruct the Tientsin Customs to permit the export of salt to Japan under this agreement, and that the Ministry has granted this request.

The agreement is the climax to to several months' negotiations between the Chinese and the Japanese sides.

PIONEER JAPANESE EMIGRANT TO HAWAII DIES AT 103

Mr. Sentaro Ishii, the only survivor of the first Japanese emigrants in Hawaii, died at the age of 103 in Kipahulu, Maui Island, on September 18.

Born in Kumamoto Prefecture in 1834, Mr. Ishii later married into a family in Honjo, Yedo. Unable to get on well with the family, he went with 152 emigrants to Hawaii in 1868. He was then wearing his hair in a topknot.

He married a native woman in Hawaii and never returned to Japan. He is survived by a son who is married and lives at Kipahulu. When Prince Iyesato Tokugawa was a visitor in Hawaii in 1923, Mr. Ishii had a photograph taken with the prince at a welcome party. Ever since, he was always proud of the fact that he was photographed with the 16th Shogun of the Tokugawa Dynasty.

Biggest Deep-Sea Fish

Domei

QUEENSTOWN, Cape.— Part of the body of an oarfish, the largest deep sea fish known, was washed up on the beach at Port St. John. The piece of body is about 6 feet long and includes the head and oarshaped tentacles. This fish is rarely seen on the surface of the water, and it is stated, only about 50 have been captured in the last 150 years.

The fact that these fish rarely appear on the surface has in the past given rise to many wild tales of sea serpents. When the fish come to the surface they flounder about helplessly and soon die.

The specimen washed up at Port St. John lacks about twelve feet of body, including the tail. Those that have been found or captured have averaged from 12 to 20 feet in length.

Fleming Proposal Termed 'Shocking'

odist Episcopal Church, Ocean Avenue and Beverley Road, Brooklyn, while the Rev. Frank C. Williams, preaching at the Epworth Methodist Episcopal Church in Whitestone, pleaded for more preaching.

Mgr. McIntyre Preaches

Mgr. McIntyre, a member of Cardinal Hayes's household, preaching to about 2,000, characterized Dr. Fleming's suggestion as a "deplorable indication of the spread and neglect and denial of God," according to the New York Times, whose report of August 17 continues: He did not refer to the rector of Trinity by name, but alluded to him as "the reverend gentleman" and described his suggestion "that the Word of God be silenced for two years" as "an utterance that has shocked the world."

Preaching on the text: "Do All Things Well," Mgr. McIntyre said modern man was "trying to do well the things of Satan and ignoring the things of God." He continued:

"Let us hope the reverend gentleman was in a facetious mood. Surely it was not malicious. Yet it is strange to think that one believing in God and having a knowledge of God should be facetious anent the Word of God.

"Imagine silencing the voice of the Maker of Universe! Imagine silencing the voice which is the only sanction of universal force in the world, the only sanction beyond the power of mankind, blinded, infuriated with egotism and passion to be greater than God Himself. To silence that voice would bring us back to pagan days.

"Let us remember, also, that Christ commanded the Twelve to "teach all nations' and that was to be done by the spoken word."

Fleming Stand Causes Surprise

Dr. Carstensen declared that since the church began, ideas similar to that of Dr. Fleming had been advanced by enemies of the church. But he thought it was strange that such a suggestion should come from "a forthright man, an able man and a godly man who says what he thinks and means what he says."

Dr. Carstensen said he agreed with Dr. Fleming that there was a "good deal of commonplace in the pulpit," and that often "men get into the pulpit because they have to say something, rather than that they have something to say."

"But he hasn't told us all the good he thinks about preaching and preachers," Dr. Carstensen continued. "I sympathize with Dr. Fleming in his pleas for more reality in the worship of God, but I don't think that reality will be attained by a disparagement of preaching."

End of Need for Church Seen

"A day will come when the church will not be needed," Mr. Hargreaves said in his sermon. "Do not misunderstand me, that day is not here now."

He then described the gradual process of growth by means of which he believes the principles of Christ will be practised far and wide in non-ecclesiastical organizations. He cited as examples to support his convictions the Boy and Girl Scouts, the 4-H Clubs, farm extension organizations in rural districts, and groups of workers aiding boys and girls brought into Juvenile Courts. He cited the reduction of crime among adolescents "without getting into church records."

"There is today a pronounced interest in spiritual revival," Mr. Hargreaves continued; "it may not be given the kind of expression we might expect, but it is very real one. This is not a day of pronounced materialism.'

Mr. Williams said in his sermon:

"Any generation that can stand by passively making a festival of the execution of a fellow human being needs more and better preaching. If we lose our ear for music, it is not music's fault.

"Our life has lost its dignity and sweep Spiritually we live from hand to mouth, few of us knowing the majesty of living up to high purposes.

"Preaching must set forth that mystical experience that links man to heaven and earth."

Landon Keeps Out Of State Contest

strong in his territory. Mr. King, the Onondaga County leader, who is here, has not declared thus far for either Syracuse candidate.

Jaeckle Said to Aid Bleakley

A strong movement has developed for the nomination of Justice Bleakley. It is apparently being fostered by Edwin F. Jaeckle, Erie County chairman, who has made no definite commitment but is believed to favor the Yonkers jurist over Senator Fearon. Justice Bleakley has the support of the Ninth Judicial District, of which Westchester County is a part, and considerable support in New York City.

Although the convention delegates will not be elected until Sept. 15, when the primary election will be held, there are comparatively few contests and the results of these are not likely to have any particular effect on the contest for the Gubernatorial nomination.

Arrangements for Governor Landon's visit here are completely in the hands of Mr. Jaeckle, who gave a luncheon for the Presidential candidate in the Hotel Statler, at which were present the delegates and alternates to the Republican National Convention from the Fortieth, Forty-first and Forty-second Congressional Districts.

This was the first group of delegates in New York to declare definitely for the nomination of Governor Landon for President, which they did on May 27. Mr. Jaeckle earlier had announced his support of the Kansas Governor.

Visits With Col. Roosevelt

Among those who called on Governor Landon was Colonel Theodore Roosevelt, who will make an extensive speaking tour and who will speak on Labor Day at Portland, Me.

The son of the former President, whom the Kansas Governor followed in the Bull Moose movement of 1912, had a half-hour talk with the Presidential candidate.

"Will Governor Landon carry New York State?" he was asked.

"Yes, we are going to carry New York for him, and that's not bunk," he replied. "We have a heavy potential vote up-State which has not come out in the past. This year it will come out and it will be for Landon."

Probably with the recollection that his father was greeted as "Teddy," Colonel Roosevelt said he regarded it as very significant that the people in the streets through which Governor Landon passed on his way from the railroad station to the hotel greeted him as "Alf."

"That hasn't happened to a Republican candidate for many a year," he said. "It means that people believe in Landon and feel that they know him."

In the evening Governor Landon was entertained at a private dinner at the home of Edward H. Butler, Buffalo publisher, his host during his stay here.

RICHARDS ARRIVE; TO BE HONORED AT KYOTO

Dr. and Mrs. Theodore Richards from Honolulu arrived today by the Tatsuta Maru. They will go to Kyoto to see the four day festival given in their honor by the Doshisha University beginning October 2.

The festival will include the dedication of the recently created "Friend Peace House" (Doshisha Hawaii Ryo) on Nashinoki-cho, near the old Imperial Palace ground; and also the 25th anniversary of the Friend Peace Scholarship of which the Richards are the founders.

During the last 25 years, through the Richards, nearly a hundred thousand dollars were spent on this scholarship, and nearly fifty Japanese youths enjoyed the benefit of the fund to study in American colleges, including the University of Hawaii, and also at Doshisha University. The Richards are known as outstanding promoters of America-Japan friendship not only in Honolulu but also in the Far East.

The festival will begin at 3 p.m. October 2 when a memorial lecture will be held in the Eldridge Fowler Chapel of the University. Dr. Richards is to lecture on "Twenty-Five years' Joy in American Japanese Friendship." Another lecture will be given by Dr. Iwao Ayusawa, director, Tokyo Branch, International Labor Office, and the first recipient of the Friend Peace Scholarship in 1911. The topic of Dr. Ayusawa's lecture will be "Basis of International Relations." President Hachiro Yuasa of the University will preside over the lecture meeting, which will be opened to the general public.

On the same day, under the auspices of Friend Peace House, there will be a banquet in the Student Club House of the University. The affair will honor Dr. and Mrs. Richards and will be participated in by the officers and friends of the Doshisha and Friend Peace Fellows in Japan. Mr. Masaichi Goto, one of the Fellows in the Doshisha, is to preside over the evening affair.

On October 3, Saturday, a dedication of Friend Peace House, also known as "Doshisha Hawaii Ryo," will be held on Nashinoki-cho near Imadegawa. Dr. Rokuro Nakaseko, one of the trustees of the House, will preside. Rev. Hayao Kashiwagi, pastor of the Haraichi Congregational Church, Gumma Ken, and another recipient of Friend Peace Scholarship during 1911, will deliver the dedication address.

At the Miyako Hotel, on the evening of October 3, President and Mrs. Hachiro Yuasa are to honor Dr. and Mrs. Richards at a "President's Dinner" to which a number of prominent officers and friends of the Doshisha are invited.

At the University Chapel, on Sunday morning, October 4, Mrs. Theodore Richards is expected to deliver an address at the 25th anniversary service. Her topic will be "Womenhood of America." Reverend Teiichi Hori, University Chaplain, will preside over the service assisted by Rev. Hayao Kashiwagi.

Under the joint auspices of Friend Peace House and the Department of Music of Doshisha Woman's College, of which Frances Benton Clapp, Mus. D., is the head, there will be a piano recital by Henry Purmort Eames of Scripps College, California. Dr. Eames was a pupil of Madam Clara Wick Schumann and Ignance J. Paderewski. Dr. Eames is here in Japan studying music under the auspices of the Kokusai Bunka Shinkokai of Tokyo. The recital will be held at the Eldridge Fowler Chapel on Monday afternoon.

Curb On Shark Fishing Is Urged On Nicaragua

The shark, considered the most dangerous fish in the tropics, at last has defenders, McTaggart & Degen, shark fishing concessionaires of Grand Cayman, B. W. I., have asked the Nicaraguan authorities to limit shark fishing to water of not more than seven feet.

The petitioners said deep-water fishing did not give the mother sharks a chance to give birth to their young in shallower waters, according to the New York Times. Fishermen assert it is hard to catch sharks in shallow water.

The authorities fear trouble because of the keen competition for sharks as a result of the demand for the skins. Already the authorities have met resistance in attempting to settle disputes among the fishermen.

Bartenders Seek To Ban Women In Nebraska Bars

Omaha Bartenders Union announced recently an intention to seek passage of a State law prohibiting women from entering bars or buying beer or liquor at them.

Thomas Delmonico, secretary of the union, said:

"We can't stop women from patronizing the bars now. More women than men are in the bars today.

"If something isn't done about it we're going to have prohibition back in a short time. That's why we're going down to the next session of the Legislature."

Rackets In 1,500 BC Bared By Tablets

Mayor In Mesopotamia Was Tried For Bribe-Taking, Tax Graft And Intimidation

Striking documentary evidence of corruption in municipal government 3,500 years ago has come to light with the translation of a set of cuneiform texts constituting by far the earliest known detailed court record of the trial of a racketeering public official.

On fourteen clay tablets, part of a collection now in the Harvard Semitic Museum, there were inscribed 200 years before the time of Moses depositions of accusers and witnesses against Mayor Kushshiharbe of the Mesopotamian city of Nuzi and a gang of his henchmen, who were charged with a series of crimes ranging from bribery and misappropriation of property to kidnapping, according to Lawrence E. Davies in the New York Times. His dispatch from Philadelphia on August 16 continues:

Dug up at the site of ancient Nuzi, ten miles from the modern oil center of Kirkuk, in Iraq, the material was deciphered by Professor Robert H. Pfeiffer, curator of the Harvard Semitic Museum. Dr. Ephraim A. Speiser, director of the American Schools of Oriental Research in Baghdad and graduate Professor of Semitics at the University of Pennsylvania, has just completed the translation of those tablets dealing with the case of "the people vs. Mayor Kushshiharbe."

Public Indignation Aroused

The translation shows that charges of the existence of a partnership between government and crime, sometimes regarded as a modern development, not only were bruited about by the citizenry in 1500 B. C. but aroused enough public indignation to place an important public official on trial.

The fact that several judges sat in the case at various times led Dr. Speiser to conclude today that it was a long drawn out proceedings. None of the tablets mentions the verdict, but it was the translators' guess that Kushshiharbe, known to Assyriologists as the "most publicized Mayor of Nuzi," was finding the going fairly rough by the time the judges finished questioning him about allegations of bribery and embazzlement and then confronted him with testimony to support a charge of immoral behavior. The Mayor's lack of composure in answering the queries on this charge left little doubt in Dr. Speiser's mind that conviction followed the taking of testimony.

Incidental to the main issues in the case, the deposition of one witness brought out that the milkmen of Kushshiharbe's day were not adverse to watering their product.

"Four sheep Kipiya took away," a court scribe quoted one Shukriya as testifying, "and from among the sheep two sheep he released and two sheep he kept. Thus he (said) 'and why indeed do you take your milk to be diluted with water?'"

The tablets were composed by people known as Hurrians, related to the Biblical Horites and now declared by Orientalists to have formed the cultural link among Egypt, Palestine and Asia Minor and the link between the Aegean and Mesopotamian civilizations.

Most Extensive Early Case

They were unearthed between 1925 and 1931 by the late Professor Edward Chiera, first of the University of Pennsylvania and later of the University of Chicago, who conducted the excavation for Harvard and the American School of Oriental Research in Baghdad.

The fourteen now shown to deal with the trial of Mayor Kushshiharbe were among several thousand texts found at the site of Nuzi. With the change in court personnel at various times during the hearings, seven of the depositions were taken by two judges, two others by a single judge and on one especially serious charge three judges questioned the Mayor and his accusers. On another text appears only the name of the court "stenographer."

"These fourteen texts dealing with the trial of Mayor Kushshiharbe cover by far the most extensive early case on record," said Dr. Speiser, who, in conjunction with Dr. Pfeiffer is preparing the material for publication in the forthcoming annual of the American Schools of Oriental Research. "For vividness and the human touch, the charges and countercharges are difficult to match anywhere. It must be remembered that these records are not later copies of earlier originals but are exactly as they left the hands of the court scribes.

"The records of abuses, so vivid and so ingenuous, throw light on the social and political conditions in Arrapha during the middle of the second millennium when the Hurrian settlement in that section was of comparatively recent date.

Wide Corruption Charged

"But the implications also are interesting, for despite his arrogance and the perfection of an efficient organization Kushshiharbe could be and ultimately was brought to trial. On final analysis, few civilizations can be given a higher endorsement than that of Nuzi as it was 3,500 years ago."

Most of the charges against Mayor Kushshiharbe, who was of Babylonian origin, embraced "corruption." He is accused in the texts of using labor gangs from feudal camps for his private purposes, of diverting tax collections to his own use and of adorning his home in Anzugalli with a gate fashioned from wood belonging to the king.

Emboldened apparently by earlier successes he accepted bribes, according to his accusers. He was charged further with using the property of private citizens to pay the wages of his own workers and fertilize his own gardens and of threatening violence to any who dared resist his emissaries.

"Thirty (pieces of) ampanna wood were placed in the gate and Kushshiharbe took them away," testified the witness Turari.

"I did not take them away," the Mayor replied in the deposition. Accused of taking wood from the palace for a door for himself, he said:

"The wood was mine and I gave it to be made into a door; and wood belonging to the palace for the making of a door did not give out."

Another accuser, one Ninuari, testified that "Kushshiharbe removed me from my threshing floor," adding:

"Two shekels of gold, one ox and two male sheep I gave to Kushshiharbe and he allowed me to return."

Abduction a Favorite Practice

Still another, Mar-Ishtar, related that Kushshiharbe's gardener took away his fertilizer.

Asked why he was doing so, the gardener was quoted as replying:

"As for you, he will order you to be flogged and your district he will order to be devastated."

"I became frightened," Mar-Ishtar told the judges, "and he removed (it)."

Accused by Zilipilla, one of his former staff members, of two trysts with a woman known as Humerelli, the Mayor became quite agitated, the translation indicates.

"No! Emphatically no!" he replied to his accusers. "Not a word of it is true!" Dr. Speiser found that kidnapping was a favorite and profitable sport among Kushshiharbe's henchmen, who apparently felt little need, as the Mayor himself did, to resort to some thin legal excuses to cover up their practices.

"I paid him two sheep and one mina (?) of lead and he released my wife," the witness Paya deposed.

"He accepted one pig and released my brother," said another.

In still another kidnapping case, instigated by Peshkilishu, one of the Mayor's underlings, the brothers of the victim raised the ransom and set out to free him. At the city of Arrapha, now Kirkuk, they hired a local man to conduct them to the "payoff" place specified by the abductors.

Bandits in Territory

The ransom, called "traveling provisions" by the witty gangsters of Kushshiharbe's day, was paid, but the brigands, instead of keeping their word, killed one of the rescuers and kidnapped the guide. Before the surviving brothers were permitted to leave an indemnity had to be paid to the captured guide's father.

This particular deposition, according to Dr. Speiser, shows that bandits operated in a territory far beyond Nuzi itself and might explain why Hashipapu was introduced into the case as a Mayor, against whose activities a futile appeal was made to Kushshiharbe.

"We cannot," Dr. Speiser said, "but regard Hashipapu as Mayor of some neighboring city. In that case it will hardly be anachronistic to speak of an extensive and highly organized partnership between government and crime."

Although he pointed to Mayor Kushshiharbe's origin as Babylonian and specifically Kassite, Dr. Speiser said it was not known how or why he became the chief magistrate of Nuzi. The translator suggested that it was just as well not to speculate upon the hypothesis that the public resentment against him, as exemplified in the charges, resulted partly from his "supercilious behavior as a 'civilized' Babylonian at the head of an 'unenlightened' and 'native' community."

Mrs. Markham Proud Of Her Achievement

the jug was upset and the coffee spilled. Her food supply for the flight had consisted only of the coffee, some nuts and some fruit.

Mrs. Markham naturally was elated at her successful crossing, but disappointed at her failure to reach New York. She was cheered by the congratulations spoken over the transatlantic telephone to her by her husband and by Captain Mollison, who several years ago attempted a similar flight to New York with his wife, Amy Mollison, but cracked up near Bridgeport, Conn.

Worn Out, Doctor Says

After she had retired, Dr. O'Neil said the aviatrix was "a very tired woman," but he added, "she is all right."

"She is worn out from lack of sleep and weak from lack of nourishment," he went on. "She is suffering from jangled nerves and eye strain, but a good rest will attend to all of that. I have ordered her to rest for at least twenty-four hours."

Before going to bed, Mrs. Markham telephoned to her New York manager, Harry Bruno, who informed her he would send a plane to Sydney to bring her to New York. But although Mrs. Markham was willing to leave tonight, Dr. O'Neil refused to permit her to do so.

Baleine Cove is at the eastern tip of Cape Breton and is said to have been the last piece of the American mainland seen by Colonel Lindbergh when he made his solo flight to Paris.

On it is a settlement of four families, about twenty persons in all.

Flew All Way by Instruments

Soon before 3 o'clock yesterday word was flashed to New York from Sydney, N. S., that Mrs. Markham had cracked up in a field in the fishing village of Baleine Cove and that she had suffered only a few scratches on the face.

Perhaps 2,000 persons were at Floyd Bennett Field awaiting Mrs. Markham until news of her crash was received. Mayor La Guardia had sent Acting Police Commissioner Harold Fowler as his representative. A suite had been reserved for her at the Ritz-Carlton Hotel.

At about 5 p.m., when Mrs. Markham was resting at the Cape Breton Flying Club, near Sydney, she was reached by telephone from Floyd Bennett Field by Harry A. Bruno of H. A. Bruno Associates, Inc., personal managers, and Lord and Lady Carberry, backers of the flight. Mrs. Markham said:

"I feel fine but am terribly disappointed that I did not reach New York. I have only a few scratches."

Assured she was applauded everywhere for having done a grand piece of work in crossing the Atlantic, Mrs. Markham repeated her disappointment at not achieving her goal and added:

"I had to fly all the way by instruments. I never saw anything. The weather was terrible. It became beastly approaching the coast. It closed in as I neared the coast and about 200 miles away I decided to land, not only because of the weather but because of my gas.

"I was too optimistic about how many miles I could cover per gallon. When I struck a wall of wind near the coast I decided to land at Harbor Grace, Nfld. But the fog prevented. I kept on and made a landing at the first opportunity when my gas gave out.

"The machine is badly mussed up. The motor was ripped out and the landing gear is gone."

Needs a "Little Sleep"

Lord Carberry advised Mrs. Markham to leave the wreck where it was and not bother about it. Told that a plane to bring her to New York, a five-place Beechcraft, had left St. Johns, Nfld., at 3 p.m., to bring her to New York, the flier said, "That's fine. I'll be glad to go. I need a little sleep now, but I'll be ready when it gets here."

Later she changed her mind and at 7:30 p.m. told Mr. Bruno by telephone at Floyd Bennett Field that she had decided to remain in Louisburg for the night. She said she planned to reach New York by plane at about 2 o'clock this afternoon.

Mayor La Guardia sent Mrs. Markham this telegram last night:

"Permit me to extend my congratulations to you on your epochal achievement in being the first woman to make a successful East-West solo crossing of the Atlantic. I share with you your disappointment in being forced down before reaching Floyd Bennett Field, your original destination. I hope you will find it convenient to continue on in another plane and look forward to the pleasure of seeing you come to New York."

Conditions for Mrs. Markham's daring enterprise augured none too well when she took off from the military airdrome at Abingdon, England, at 1:50 p.m., New York time, Friday. The prospect of bad weather after reaching the American coast did not, however, swerve her from her purpose.

Under normal circumstances, she believed she would land in New York yesterday at an early afternoon hour. The four-passenger cabin had been undone to provide special fuel tanks, giving the high-speed monoplane a range of about 3,800 miles and a possible sustained flight of twenty-six hours under favorable conditions.

Powered by a Gypsy VI engine of 200 horsepower, the plane had a maximum speed of 170 miles an hour at sea level and a cruising pace of about 150 miles. From the mechanical standpoint, Mrs. Markham's exploit may have been plausible. But the airfield attendants shook their heads discouragingly.

Mrs. Markham's reply was that "flying is my job and the Atlantic is part of it." She predicted a great transocean service and said she was ambitious to be one of its pioneers. She was quite casual about it as the engine was warmed up and lost no time climbing aboard, waving goodbye and taking a graceful leave.

A tail wind and a full moon encouraged Mrs. Markham on her flight at the start. At 5:30 p.m., New York time, the blue adventurer in the skies cut over Castletown Berehaven, County Cork, on the west coast of Ireland. Since Mrs. Markham had no radio, no word was received from her direct.

After she had passed over Ireland the first record of her flight came yesterday morning when the Radio Corporation of America intercepted the following message from the steamship Spaarndam, a Holland-America Line freighter headed toward New York from Rotterdam.

"Airplane, probably Mrs. Markham's, passed the S. S. Spaarndam at 7 a.m., E. S. T., position 47:54 N., 48.22 W., heading for Newfoundland."

This position was about 1,500 miles from New York. At 9:35 a.m., New York time, The Messenger, flying high, was sighted over Renews on the southeast tip of Newfoundland. Mrs. Markham circled the bay, very likely to check maps, then bolted off for Cape Race, twenty-five miles to the southwest, according to reports received here. In ten minutes she sped over that community and a few minutes later was seen above Drook Point. Rain prevailed at the time. Soon afterward word of her crash came.

Record of Flights

The westward flight to America over the North Atlantic has been especially hazardous to aviators in heavier-than-air machines. Only two planes bound for New York have ever made the trip non-stop. Other flights have ended short of their goal or made the trip in stages.

The record of previous successful flights follows:

1924—Two of the army round-the-world planes, under command of Lieutenant Lowell H. Thomas crossed by the island route.

1928—The Junkers monoplane Bremen flew from Dublin to Greenly Island, off Labrador, on April 12 and 13 with Captain Herman Koehl, Major James Fitzmaurice and Baron Guenther von Huenefeld.

1930—Commander Charles Kingsford-Smith, Captain J. P. Saul, Captain Evert Van Dyk and J. W. Stannage flew from Portmarnock, Ireland, to Harbor Grace, Nfld., in the Southern Cross, reaching New York June 26.

1930—In August Captain Wolfgang von Gronau, Edward Zimmer, Fritz Albrecht and Franz Hack reached New York in a Dornier-Wal flying boat by way of Iceland and Greenland. Captain von Gronau made two subsequent flights by the Arctic route in 1931 and 1932.

1930—Sept. 2, Captain Dieudonne Coste and Lieutenant Maurice Bellonte made the first non-stop flight, Paris to New York.

1932—Captain James A. Mollison flew from Portmarnock, Ireland to Pennfield Ridge, N. B. Aug. 18, and then continued on to New York.

1933—General Italo Balbo led twenty-four Italian flying boats from Orbetello, Italy, to Chicago, stopping en route. They visited New York on the return trip July 19.

1933—Captain James A. Mollison and his wife, Amy Johnson, flew from Pendine, Wales, and were forced down at Stratford, Conn., almost within sight of their goal, on July 23.

1934—May 26, Maurice Rossi and Paul Codos completed a non-stop flight Paris to New York.

Two women have been lost on previous East to West flights. In August, 1927, the Princess Ludwig Lowenstein-Wertheim left Upavon, England, with two army officers in the monoplane St. Raphael. Their plane disappeared over the sea and was never again sighted.

The Hon. Elsie Mackay started on March 13, 1928, with Captain R. G. Hinchliffe from Cramwell Airdrome, at Lincoln. Their plane disappeared into the sea. A Viennese actress, Lilli Dillenz, started a westward flight in 1927 and reached the Azores, but gave up the attempt without continuing.

London And Paris Need Mutual Aid of the coming Armageddon made France recoil from the idea of fighting Great Britain. The entente was then prepared by local agreements, the avowed object of which was to open the way for the major problem of cooperation in Europe.

The situation in North Africa was stabilized. France got a free hand in Morocco in exchange for ending the competition in Egypt. Colonial rivalry was changed into cooperation.

Today, exactly as before the war, the need exists for harmony between Great Britain and France as imperial powers. This is true in the Near East and in the basin of the Pacific as well. A movement in favor of racial unity is sweeping over Egypt, Palestine, Syria and Iraq.

Great Britain and France harm each other if they pursue divergent policies in that part of the world. A French policy in Syria reacts upon the British position in Palestine, and events in Egypt find their repercussion in Damascus.

In the Far East, Singapore, one of the key positions of a British Indian Ocean, needs a strong France at its flank in Indo-China. The entente, while preparing to defend the peace of Europe, permits immediate collaboration in other parts of the world.

We live in an epoch when written treaties decay with an amazing speed. The constitution of the Anglo-French entente remains unwritten. Sentiment has no part in it, only the ruthless drive of an essential need.

All Able-Bodied Men Ordered To Front by Madrid

Mola Issues Mobilization Decree; Only Few Officials Left In Capital

Domei

MADRID, Sept. 28—Reflecting the pressing situation on the front, the leftist Government here today hurriedly ordered every able-bodied man available in the capital to the front to strengthen the defense of the city against the insurgents' onslaught, it was revealed here today.

Answering current rumors alleging that ruling officials of the Popular Front Government have abandoned the capital, the Government this afternoon offered an explanation in an official communique, saying that reveral ministers are absent from the capital on their tour of inspection but that they would return to Madrid soon.

Mola Issues Decree

Domei

BURGOS, Sept. 28—In a move to reinforce the rebel troops in preparation for the impending general offensive against Madrid, General Emilio Mola, Commander of the northern fascist forces, today issued a mobilization decree enlisting all youths living in the districts so far occupied by the insurgents.

Under the new decree, all young men between 20 and 24 years of age in those areas are requested to present themselves to local rebel headquarters to be enlisted for compulsory military service.

Meanwhile, reports reaching here from the capital today indicated that the leftist militiamen, who had recently arrived at Madrid from Catalonia Province, when ordered to march to the Somo Sierra front, refused to obey the order and part of them left the capital for their province.

Nationalists Capture Toledo

Domei

TOLEDO, Sept. 28—The City of Toledo, long-coveted objective of persistent rebel attacks, today completely fell into the hands of the fascist troops. Despite intensive aerial and artillery bombardments of the city preceding the rebel capture, the city, except the Castle of Alcazar, remained mostly intact.

The defenders of Alcazar joined the battle when General Francisco Franco's forces entered the city, charging from ruins and shouting deliriously, "Viva Espana!" The insurgents claimed that nearly 300 leftists were killed in the battle and many others taken prisoner.

A small patrol of 20 fascists under Commander Muzzing led the entry into the city of rebel troops, while the leftists fled along roads leading to the east and south as the insurgents cut the direct road connecting the city and Madrid near Oliasdelrey, 16 kilometers north of this city. Main fascist forces commanded by General Varela and Colonel Yague rode to Toledo on trucks.

Admits Rebel Advance

Domei

MADRID, Sept. 28—Although avoiding reference to persistent reports of rebel capture of Toledo, the Government, in an official communique issued this morning, admitted that insurgents have advanced on the Toledo front, thus compelling the loyalists to "retreat in perfect order." The Government announcement added that the loyalist forces have fortified Toledo and its vicinity.

Lovelock To Compete In Princeton Bowl

Domei

LONDON, Sept. 17—The New Zealander, Jack Lovelock, who established a world's record in winning the 1,500 meters in the Olympic Games at Berlin, left here today to compete in the "Mile of the Century," which will be held at the Princeton Bowl on October 3.

One of his opponents will be Glen Cunningham, who finished second in the 1,500 meters—four yards behind.

Lovelock won the "Mile of the Century" race at Princeton last year, defeating, among others, Cunningham, Bill Bronthon and Gene Venzke.

This is generally believed to be the New Zealander's last season of running. After his great win at Berlin, he said: "I shall go on running this season, but shall then retire for some years, perhaps for good."

Lovelock will soon be Doctor Jack Lovelock. He is studying at St. Mary's Hospital, London, for the medical profession, and is very keen on his work.

He is also a lightweight boxer above the average, and at Otago University in New Zealand, was a rugby footballer.

NEW SANNO HOTEL

The new Sanno Hotel in Atami, Shizuoka prefecture, opened on September 10. It is under the management of the Sanno Hotel, Akasaka, and is situated halfway up the mountain south of Atami. It commands a supreme view facing, the mountain and the sea in the distance. It also has quiet surroundings apart from the buzz of the crowded hot spring resort. It is warm in winter and cool in summer. It takes only one hour and a half to reach there by train from Tokyo.

The three-story hotel is equipped with more than 20 suites of single and double Japanese and foreign rooms. The ground floor comprises a drawing room, sitting-room, large dining-room, grill, stand-bar and a verandah, all giving one impression of a villa. In addition there are a small villa and tea room in the neighborhood of the main building.

THRIFT SHOP

The Thrift Shop, on Tansu-machi, will reopen Friday. There will be a special food sale on that day and also a display of new stock which has been assembled during the summer.

international credit.

He was able to show to some extent at least that France, which imports from Germany now considerably more than she exports, would be a considerable gainer and that this country was actually suffering from the system that the Reich had been forced to employ to get foreign exchange.

There is little doubt that, although Dr. Schacht always protests he knows nothing about politics, his whole effort is toward building up commercial and financial harmony that would reduce the dangers of an outbreak of ill-temper.

Seeks Credit Machinery

He has no "plan," for he is too much an economist to think any cut-and-dried plan can ever be accepted and, if accepted, work. What he is seeking to do, he says, is to set machinery in motion with London as the credit center.

For the moment there is no doubt the different values of currencies are a serious obstacle, and so long as the President of the United States holds the power to devaluate the dollar further it is felt here nothing is to be done. In that connection there was comment today that a monetary conference for stabilization would be of more effective value than the summoning of any meeting of the heads of States for assertions that they all want peace.

Even if monetary stabilization cannot be obtained at once, Dr. Schacht urges that a beginning might be made at pooling credit. He hopes to return to Paris shortly to continue the conversations and pursue an examination of the different suggestions that have been made.

Hearst Is Called Republican Boss, Landon's Guide

Ickes Calls Publisher 'Svengali' To Kansan's 'Trilby' And A Chief Campaign Issue

United States Secretary Ickes declared in a campaign speech over the radio from Washington, D. C., on August 27 that William Randloph Hearst was "the new Republican boss," and he quoted testimony given in a Chicago lawsuit in July to show that Mr. Hearst had advised against too many campaign speeches by Governor Landon, Republican nominee for President.

In an address over a Columbia Broadcasting System network, on the subject of "Hearst Over Topeka," Mr. Ickes asserted that the question of "Hearst over the White House" was "one of the most important issues, if not in fact the transcendent issue, of this campaign," according to the New York Times, whose Washington report of August 27 continues:

Mr. Ickes read from what purported to be a certified copy of testimony in a suit, which is still pending, between Addie Clark Harding and George F. Harding, newly elected Republican National Committeeman for Illinois, and others.

Quotes Hearst Memorandum

The Secretary explained that what he read was a memorandum from Mr. Hearst to Mr. Harding, after they had had a conference at the publisher's ranch at San Simeon.

The memorandum, as read by Mr. Ickes, was as follows:

"I was very much impressed by what you had to say about Governor Landon not making too many speeches. If you will write me to that effect expressing your views as frankly as you did when you were talking I will with your permission, send the letter to Governor Landon.

"It cooperates with and supports what I have already told the Governor and I feel that such views, coming from such an important man as yourself, would have a great and valuable influence. I think the Governor naturally feels this himself but the average politician around him is continually urging him to get out and talk. Talk is the method of the average politician, but, as you very truly said, this a campaign in which speechmaking might do more harm than good.

"At present the Democrats have nothing to criticize Governor Landon about. You can see that in their attempt to criticize him. Too many speeches might give the Democrats their eagerly wanted opportunity. Others try to combat or at least try to offset the influence of those politicians who are continually demanding more speeches."

Likens Publisher to "Sevengali"

After reading the memorandum, Mr. Ickes remarked:

"If he is a Trilby, who, except William Randolph Hearst, can be the Svengali? If you want to get into communication with the Republican candidate for President, the surest way is through Mr. Hearst. I venture to say that there are those high in Republican circles who wish that Mr. Hearst had a styptic effect upon the vocal organs of Mr. John D. M. Hamilton equal to that which he seems to have upon those of Governor Landon."

The Secretary declared that "this illuminating record makes clear another point that has puzzled those who have been astonished at the sudden taciturnity of the friendly and ordinarily expressive Governor Landon." He added that "Mr. Hearst early in the game cautioned him against talking too much and a word of caution from that source was all that Governor Landon needed."

Mr. Ickes asserted that Governor Landon had evaded campaign issues on his recent speech-making trip in the East "except for his promise last night at Buffalo, if elected, to reduce the taxes on corporation surpluses."

Governor Landon, the Secretary continued, "may choose to ignore the promise that he made in his speech of acceptance to discuss the problems of government in detail; he may do these things with respect to other important questions of the day, but the Hearst issue cannot be evaded."

Mr. Ickes said Mr. Hearst had set out deliberately last Winter to "build up" Governor Landon for the Republican Presidential nomination and in the process Governor Landon "gradually discarded every conviction that would link him with the progressive movement of the country or the New Deal."

Mr. Ickes quoted from Governor Landon's speech at West Middlesex, Pa., last week that the campaign issue is "between the pig in the poke polices" of the Roosevelt administration and traditional American institutions.

The Secretary of the Interior said that the "pig in the poke" reference applied to Governor Landon and not to President Roosevelt, "whose policies have been frankly disclosed to the country as they developed."

"He and his partisans are asking the country to buy a 'pig in a poke' —in other words, to elect a candidate who has no record or experience on national questions; who is distinguished for what he does not say about the issues of the campaign; who carefully refrains from saying anything that might mean something; who if he knows anything about the business of the Federal Government keeps that knowledge strictly to himself."

At his press conference today, Secretary Ickes struck back at charges published in the Hearst newspapers that he profited personally from the sale of his book "Back to Work—The Story of the PWA."

"I only availed myself of my own information bureau to which all of you reporters have access," he said. "The information bureau gives Mr. Hearst and the Republican National Committee, too, the same services.

"Furthermore, the profits from the book were not enough to boast about. I don't think the public was as appreciative of my literary efforts as it should have been. But the sales may pick up now."

William Hard broadcasting tonight under the auspices of the Republican National Committee, took Mr. Ickes to task for what he described as attempts "to blacken the character of Governor Landon by blackening the character of Mr. Hearst."

The news commentator recalled that Elliott Roosevelt, President Roosevelt's second son, works for Mr. Hearst's radio interests "with conspicuous success," and that Charles Michaelson, publicity adviser to the Democratic National Committee, had twenty years of experience on Hearst newspapers.

France Sponsors Atlantic Air Race

New York-Paris Derby In May To Mark 10th Anniversary Of Lindbergh Flight

As a fitting commemoration of the tenth anniversary of Colonel Charles A. Lindbergh's transatlantic flight, the French Air Minister, Pierre Cot, on August 27 announced his decision to organize an international transatlantic air derby from New York to Paris on May 21 next year.

Following this announcement the newspaper Intransigeant decided to offer for international competition an aeronautical blue ribbon of the Atlantic, which will be awarded for the first time to the winner of this race, according to the New York Times whose Paris dispatch of August 27 continues:

Details of the competition have not yet been completed, but airmen of all nations will be qualified to enter. Mr. Cot asked General Edouard Hirschauer, France's delegate, to make the announcement of the air derby to the International Aeronautical Congress now in session at Warsaw. It is hoped that at least a score of airmen will be ready to participate next year.

One stipulation to be made is that the take-off will be on May 21 regardless of weather conditions, as aviation enthusiasts claim that enough progress has been made in aviation since Colonel Lindbergh's triumph to make this possible.

In the Summer of 1927 three transatlantic flights were made in quick succession, but after long preparations and after considerable waiting for favorable conditions. It was predicted then by competent authorities that within ten years regular commercial air services would be functioning between New York and Paris.

Aviation circles here contend that the reason that this has not yet become a reality is through no fault of aviation, which is now fully capable of maintaining a regular air route to New York, but that the fault lies with international commerce, which has declined and thus has retarded use of rapid transportation facilities that might readily be made available.

Pacific Lines Cited

They point to the Pacific airlines, which have conquered difficulties as great as any offered by the Atlantic, and also the fact that German fliers are making their first important experiments with a view to establishing future airlines.

The French air derby next year will be a non-stop flight in an effort to duplicate the Lindbergh exploit.

It will coincide with the Paris International Exposition opening in May and the air derby is expected to prove as great a drawing card as was the flight of Marshal Italo Balbo's air fleet to the Chicago Century of Progress Exposition.

"Colonel Lindbergh," says Intransigeant tonight, "so startled the world by his exploit that it was easy to believe it was a miracle. As a matter of fact it was nothing of the kind. Colonel Lindbergh, a former airline pilot, was daring but precise and familiar with all the problems of the air and his attempt came as a climax to long and serious study. Inspired by his determination to conquer these problems, he achieved astonishing success when every one else doubted.

"France desires to pay a fitting tribute to this man and his success. France desires that Colonel Lindbergh's exploit shall be commemorated as an historical event."

Colonel Lindbergh flew from New York to Paris in 33½ hours. It is the hope of the organizers that the first winner of the transatlantic air derby will make the flight in less than 20 hours.

Large Prize Posted

PARIS, Aug. 27.—The French Government announced plans today to sponsor a transatlantic air race with a prize of 1,000,000 francs and a blue ribbon for the winner. Colonel Charles A. Lindbergh's non-stop flight won him the $25,000 prize offered by Raymond Orteig, New York hotel owner, for the first to make such a flight.

Pierre Cot, Air Minister, disclosed plans for the race to a representative of the International Aeronautics Federation.

The government hoped for at least twenty entrants in the race. It planned to invite Colonel Lindbergh, as first holder of the record, to greet the winner.

Transatlantic Air Service Accord Details Revealed

range for the provision of the necessary airport, radio, and meteorological facilities for the transatlantic service. In connection with the general transfer of meteorological services to a new organization being developed in the Irish Free State the United Kingdom Government will make an annual contribution of £6,000 to the Irish Free State Government on the basis of services rendered.

Each of the four Governments concerned has also undertaken to grant the necessary landing and transit rights within its own territory to the joint company and to Pan American Airways. It is contemplated that unless otherwise determined by the consent of the four Governments such rights will be exclusive in respect of transatlantic air services for a period of 15 years; thereafter the question of exclusivity and the question of granting further financial assistance to the joint company will be reviewed.

Inter-Governmental Committee

An inter-Governmental committee on transatlantic air services will be established, consisting of four members appointed respectively by the Governments of the United Kingdom, Canada, the Irish Free State, and Newfoundland, to which will be referred for approval decisions of proposals of the joint company relating to transatlantic air services which may affect national policy or the relations of the Governments concerned inter se or with other Governments. All decisions of the inter-Governmental committee will be reached by unanimous vote.

Power Men See Boom In Next 15 Years and use of our resources can be had.

"It is hoped, after all sides have been heard and after the experiences of all leading nations have been compared, that some common ground for the development and use of electric power may be found."

New Use for Fuels

Fuels which long have been used by mankind solely as sources of heat, light or power may soon be serving new and unheard-of purposes, according to reports submitted for the power conference.

Researchists throughout the world are engaged in the search for new uses for coal, oil and gas. Expansion of the fuel industries is gradually being brought about by the discovery of new processes in which foreign governments everywhere are interesting themselves.

Germany and Japan are among the nations reporting successful experiments in developing coal by-products. Both the United States and Great Britain are making similar efforts to wring new uses from coal. Similarly, gas is being subjected to important experiments.

Tendency Toward Control

A tendency toward ever-increasing control of power resources is reported by almost every nation. This trend is expected to be debated thoroughly at conference sessions with representatives of all schools of thought in the great industrial nations participating.

The discussion of government control indicates that unrestricted competition as it was known earlier in this country has been gradually abandoned as far as the coal industry abroad is concerned. In the opinion of foreign writers, individual countries have found that an unregulated system of production brought results that were socially undesirable.

Similarly, in the gas industry, the trend is toward strong control and, in many European countries, toward public ownership. The oil industry is being subjected to stringent regulation also, particularly in efforts by individual governments to insure supply for home markets.

In the search for new fuel uses, much attention has been devoted to the development of motor fuels from coal and gas. Germany, for instance, describes a process by which any fuel—even the lowest grade—can be converted into comparatively high-grade gasoline.

Germany may soon be dotted with filling stations which will sell natural and manufactured gas as fuel for automobiles, it is stated. Plans are being made for the construction of such stations; and automobiles which can efficiently operate on this fuel will soon be marketed on a limited scale, the Germans say.

The gas is carried in steel flasks with pressures of about 2500 pounds and is pumped from filling stations by multi-stage compressors that assure rapid and safe filling.

In Japan, a high-grade motor fuel—about 700 octanes—has been successfully produced from low-grade coal. It is satisfactory for airplane use as well as automobile, say authorities.

Future possibilities for the use of natural gas and gas products derived from petroleum refining are becoming apparent in Argentina. In that country, it is indicated, high temperatures and high humidity affect the method of gas installations.

In Great Britain, where there are no commercial developments of oil at the present time, licenses authorizing a search for oil have been granted, covering a considerable area.

Too Much or Too Little

The oil problem in the United States, stripped of its technicalities, is that there is always too much or too little oil. But when production control is exercised, according to Robert E. Hardwicke of Fort Worth, Texas, the problem of limiting imports becomes increasingly important.

Addresses by President Roosevelt, Secretary of State Cordell Hull, Secretary of the Interior Harold L. Ickes, Floyd L. Carlisle, Owen D. Young and emissaries of more than two dozen foreign nations are included in the program of the conference as announced today by O. C. Merrill, director.

The conference and the concurrent second congress on large dams, both of which will be devoted to a discussion of the world's power problems, will open in Washington Sept. 7, continuing through Sept. 12. About 3000 persons, including 700 persons from 52 foreign nations, are expected.

Hokkaido military maneuvers.

GREATER EASE PROVIDED FOR STRAP-HANGERS

The newly issued monthly "passes" of the Tokyo City Tramway are being popularly received, and more than 30,000 of them have been sold. In view of this success, the Electric Bureau plans to issue pass cards by which Shosen passengers can change for the city trams at Shimbashi, Yurakucho, Tokyo and Kanda Stations without buying the latter service's tickets.

COLLEGE TO INCLUDE THEATER IN BUILDING

Bunka Gakuin in Kanda, Tokyo, is to build a new college building shortly. Its outstanding feature will be a theater with 600 seats within it. The new building was planned by Mr. Isaku Nishimura, and will require some ¥160,000 to construct.

SHITAYA WARD REWARDING SOLDIERS

There are 125 soldiers serving in Manchoukuo who have come from Shitaya Ward, Tokyo, and the ward's citizens are to send them photographs of their families in consolation bags.

POLICE WELFARE TO BE PROVIDED

The Metropolitan Police Board intends to make an appropriation of ¥100,000 in the next fiscal year to promote the welfare of the policemen in its service. About 14,000 policemen are to be accorded better treatment by the measure.

WATER POLICE TO STUDY ENGLISH

In view of the necessity of training water police in preparation for giving special facilities to foreign tourists and visitors to Japan, especially for those who visit here for the coming Tokyo 1940-Olympic Games, the Yoshida Water Police Master of Yokohama has decided to open an English language study class on the third floor of the Yokohama Water Police Station for four years from September 30. Lessons will be given for one hour daily from 8 o'clock in the morning.

Interpreter Asano of the Foreign Affairs Section of the Yokohama Water Police Station has been nominated to be a teacher to the study class to petty water police.

Lester Named Deputy Secretary Of League

Domei

GENEVA, Sept. 30—Mr. Sean Lester, League's High Commissioner at Danzig, was today named Deputy-Secretary of the League of Nations replacing Mr. Pedro de Azcarate, who has been appointed new Spanish ambassador at London.

Following the High Commissioner's appointment, League observers expressed the belief that Mr. Lester will not be replaced at Danzig. This belief was further strengthened by the statement of French Foreign Minister Yvon Delbos, who declared that Mr. Lester's appointment will not modify the League's relation with the Free State.

Bourbon Prince Dies After Automobile Crash

Domei

VIENNA, Sept. 29—Prince Charles Alphonse of Bourbon, 87-year-old head of the Bourbon-Anjou house and pretender to the throne of Spain, succumbed here today to injuries which he received yesterday in a motorcar accident.

Born in London in 1849, Prince Charles succeeded to the title of Duke of San Jaime in 1931 and was infante of Spain. He married Princess Maria das Neves, infanta of Portugal, in 1852 and headed the Carlists' fight for the Spanish throne over 60 years ago.

The house of Bourbon-Anjou is one of the French branches of the Bourbon royal family.

First Real Fascist Conflict In France

on the heels of the disastrous monetary debacle of 1926 which impoverished and embittered vast numbers of "petits bourgeois," until at the general elections in May of this year more than half the French nation voted for the predominantly proletarian Popular Front of Socialists, Radicals and Communists.

Conservatives Organize

Against this socialistic—though not yet actually Socialist—Popular Front regime, and especially against the sovietization of France which they fear, or profess to fear, will follow it, the extreme conservative elements in France—the Roman Catholic Church, the militaristic caste, the "grande bourgeoisie"—have reacted vigorously by organizing nationalistic and violently anti-marxist groups more or less secretly fascist under a facade of republicanism. The "leagues," which had contributed indirectly to the formation of the Popular Front by their all-too-obvious fascist nature, have been dissolved, and have given place to new political superparties: the French Social Party under Col. Francois de la Rocque, chief of the former Croix de Feu; the French Popular Party under the ex-Communist and would-be future Fuehrer—Jacques Doriot.

Between the two extremes, however, stands the hope of France for a peaceful and orderly solution of its problems: those pre-eminently French qualities of moderation and reason and common sense—"le bon sens francais." Frenchmen and Frenchwomen in both camps—and in neither—are working actively, desperately, to bring about a compromise, to find a reasonable middle way out of the dilemma, to avoid any repetition in France of the tragic fratricidal strife which broke out recently in Spain.

More Than Economic

Thus the fundamental conflict smoldering beneath the surface in France flaring up now and then only to sink again into uneasy slumber is not merely economic; it is also and perhaps even primarily political, social and moral. Furthermore, it is obviously not confined to France alone, for the forces arising out of the Industrial Revolution and intensified by its latest phase, unemployment, are naturally operating in other countries as well. As highly industrialized democracies, the United States and Great Britain also face, in varying forms and differing degree, the same essential problem. This underlying issue, this vital question at stake in France today—in America and in Britain tomorrow—may be briefly summed up as follows:

Can liberal democracy with its three essential elements of individual liberty, representative self-government and free economic initiative, survive the shock of its simultaneous clash with fascism and communism? Can France devise peaceably—in time—a new regime capable of reconciling the Republic, of which the basic unit is the individual, with collectivism, with the world-wide revolt of the masses who in their search for greater economic security demand constantly increased power for the collectivity, of which the basic unit is, in the case of fascism, the "totalitarian State," and, in the case of communism, the proletariat?—

Backwash of World War

The full significance for the rest of the world of this issue appears only when the conflict in France is viewed in the light of postwar political developments in Europe. Looking back at events of the last 20 years, one seems to see a veritable tidal wave of absolutism, lingering backwash of the World War, sweeping across the continent. In its everwidening wake, lashed into even greater turbulence lately by the economic crisis, it leaves a succession of dictatorships, derelicts of half a dozen different liberal regimes capsized like cockleshells in a tropical storm.

Germany, Italy and Austria submit to fascism in one form or another. Spain is torn by tragic civil war which, whatever its ultimate outcome, probably spells the temporary end of libral democracy there. Russia labors under an increasingly nationalistic dictatorship of the proletariat whose resemblance to fascism is disconcertingly close in many ways. Poland, Hungary, Bulgaria, Yugoslavia, Latvia and other smaller European countries have been forced to eliminate most of the liberal elements in their respective regimes.

France Feels Impact

France alone of the great continental nations has so far remained faithful to democracy, to the Third Republic, and the personal political and economic liberalism on which it is founded. Today, France too is feeling the full impact of the anti-democratic deluge, while at the same instant her keel scrapes ominously against the rock-bottom of economic depression.

Will the French Republic, racked by these international storms, weakened within by civil strife, and by the many glaring faults and acknowledged abuses of its own democratic institutions, be able to weather the shock? Or will the last continental rampart of liberalism be swept away, leaving the way open for the flood of mass-mentality dictatorship, facist and proletarian, to continue its course westward?

It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that millions in England and the United States are asking with interest today: "Will France go Fascist?" "Could France become Communist?"

One final fact, however, which seems to have generally escaped notice, must be emphasized. It is this: not one of the nations in which fascism or dictatorship has triumphed possessed what could honestly be called a solid democratic foundation—a sound and seasoned historical basis upon which a lasting liberal regime might be constructed.

Both the German and Austrian republics were somewhat frail and artificial affairs, grafted onto stubborn absolutist stock in the abnormal atmosphere immediately after the war. The Republic in Spain was barely five years old. In Italy, liberalism was still in its anarchic infancy under a constitutional monarchy itself far from stable; while as for Tsarist Russia, no comment is required.

France, on the contrary, does possess a liberal tradition and a firm historical foundation of democratic experience. Only England, and perhaps the United States, can claim a more deep-rooted democracy or a longer-lived liberalism.

What does this imply? It shows that fascism—using the term in the broad sense of all anti-democratic and anti-liberal absolutism—is in reality just beginning its first fight with a foe worthy of the name.

That is why the current conflict in France—which might thus be called "Fascism's first real fight"—is vital and interesting not merely to the French people and their continental neighbors but to Britain and America as well. The struggle between individualism and collectivism, between democracy and dictatorship in France contains timely warnings for the people of both these countries, calling them to waken and watch more vigilantly, lest France's fight today become the forerunner of similar conflicts later in Britain and the United States.

Soviets Face Reich In Balkan Rivalry

Russia Strives For Leadership Once Held By France Among The Small Powers

The struggle now going on between the Soviet Union and Germany to gain the upper hand in the Balkans brings into conflict two unlike styles of political scheming. Russia is trying to mend fences against Germany originally built up by France but lately neglected. Germany, on the offensive for many months and strengthened by the Austro-German pact, is encouraging the little powers to be cool to the League, suspicious of France and hostile to Russia, says an article by George Weller in the New York Times of recent date which follows:

So enduring is Balkan belief in German thoroughness that the legations of the Reich in Greece and Turkey have been able to build up a heavy arms trade even while Germany was a pariah in League circles and these countries were pursuing enthusiastic pro-League policies. With Germany thus preempting Frace's role in the business of weapons, a paradox arises by which the States having most to lose by a break-up of the existing peace are going for arms to the power considered most likely to break it.

When a little Balkan State shifts arms orders from France to Germany it means that foreign policy must be adjusted to fit the change. Czechoslovakia and Rumania have their own arms factories, but the unindustrialized Balkan States are dependent for their national defense on purchases abroad. The general staff of a small power must do some realistic thinking before placing an order which means confiding part of its military efficiency to another nation and counting on that nation's good-will for eventual replenishment of its material.

Russia Hampered

Free to maneuver like a capitalist State in every other field, the Soviet Union in the arms market is still tangled in the old revolutionary strategy, for a Communist axiom forbids the export of arms for the use of foreign capitalist governments.

Bound by no such precept, Germany has evolved a technique of buying more grains and fruits from Balkan countries than she can consume, crediting these in frozen marks, selling her surplus abroad at a loss and offering the little powers a way to liquidate their Reichsbank credits by purchases of arms. The little countries have already decided to rearm to protect themselves against Ethiopia's fate; they must buy outside their own country and they buy from Germany to thaw their credits. If they want more shells, spare parts for airplanes or warships, and secrecy for past purchases, they must keep their relations with the Reich friendly.

An example of this system was the recent purchase of about $13,500,000 worth of war material by Greece. The Germans wanted credits taken out in artillery, ammunition and destroyers. The Greeks, in a desperate attempt to keep at least some of their ties with Great Britain, specified that the new destroyers listed for purchase were to be built in Glasgow but armed with German guns.

The Russian Plan

Russia's plan to make up for the ground she has lost to Germany, without as yet openly shuffing off the ban on arms export, is shown at two points: (1) The new strategic railroad to be constructed this fall across Northern Rumania connecting Czechoslovakia and Russia, and (2) the fortification of the Dardanelles by Russian or other non-German engineers, which the Soviets have made a point of honor with Turkey, while the latter has been dickering with the Reich for this work.

The Bessarabian railroad agreement is first blood for the new Soviet diplomacy, which aims to take over the French leadership of the Little Entente. But full price for it has been exacted by Germany. Yugoslavia, key member of the Entente, steadfastly refuses to recognize the Soviet Union. No hint is forthcoming that Belgrade approves the military connections that Prague and Bucharest have made with Moscow. Therefore what seems a Russian victory may prove a step toward the secession of Yugoslavia from the Little Entente and her possible desertion into the German camp.

Bolivia Passing Through Era Of Steady Progress

this noble pile and it is calculated that they will not finish before another quarter of a century. La Paz boasts 200,000 inhabitants and possesses hotels, industries and commerce commensurate with its size.

For the historian, or for the archaeologist, Bolivia offers a rich field. All the civilizations of the continent have stratified—if one may use the term—in plateau of this ancient country. One may say that it is a living lesson of American history. The striking ruins of Tiahuanaco reflect the glory of the earliest civilization of 18,000 years ago. Potosi still breathes something of the spirit of colonial days, and the old Spanish Mint, where the Conquistadors' successors sealed the silver mined in the famous Potosi hill, is still in an excellent state of preservation.

Then there is Sucre, city of the Independence, whose anniversary was celebrated recently. There, in Sucre, still vibrates the spirit of the doctors of the old university of Chuquisaca, who gave the first cry of rebellion against the might of Spain. Still preserved there, just as it was, is the room in which Bolivar and Sucre proclaimed the independence of Bolivia.

16 Pct. Devaluation Believed Likely Of The Czech Crown

Prague Officials Meeting To Cope With Situation Following French Move

Domei

PRAGUE, Oct. 2—While official quarters refused to reveal details of financial program now under contemplation by the Government, well-informed financial circles predicted that Czechoslovakia will devaluate her currency by 16 per cent in order to cope with the current international monetary situation following France's devaluation move.

A cabinet meeting was held this afternoon but it is believed that no definite decision was taken on financial measures, but that the Ministers of Finance and National Economy were entrusted with working out and recommending appropriate steps in dealing with the financial situation and in subscribing to international alignment of currencies.

It is recalled in this connection that the Czech crown was devaluated by 16.66 per cent on October 2, 1934. It is held in financial circles that the projected devaluation would equalize the exchange rate of the Czech crown and its purchasing power on the home market.

Vitamin A Found To Attack Disease

their microscopes on the lowly cabbage and reported that "the varieties of cabbage commonly grown for harvesting early in the Summer are much higher in Vitamin C than those usually cut late in the Autumn for kraut manufacture and Winter storage.

"On a percentage basis, Summer cabbage is higher in Vitamin C than orange juice, whereas Autumn cabbage contains a little more than half as much."

But during "open-kettle cooking of cut cabbage a considerable proportion of its Vitamin C (somewhat more than one-fourth of its anti-scorbutic vitamin content) is dissolved in the cooking water and some is destroyed by oxidation."

Vitamin A as Weapon

Dr. S. W. Clausen and Dr. A. B. McCoord of the University of Rochester Medical School, telling of their experiments to determine just what degree of deficiency of Vitamin A is of importance, concluded:

"We feel that Vitamin A must play an important part in the struggle of the human body against disease and infection. As a supply of this vitamin in the tissues is exhausted by the fever (they studied pneumonia patients and patients subjected to artifical fever, as well as albino rats), more of the vitamin appears to be mobilized from the liver to points where it is most needed."

Dr. Joseph L. Swirbely of the Carnegie Institute of Technology concluded that his studies indicated that "Vitamin C in the essential factor in preventing scurvy and may be necessary in adequate amounts for proper utilization of the cortical hormone," while Alex Sigal and Professor Charles G. King of the University of Pittsurgh held that "Vitamin C serves as a major factor in tissue respiration and is closely linked with a major type of metabolic activity."

Dr. Roe E. Remington of the Medical College of the State of South Carolina, reporting on experiments involving the growth of goiter, said:

"I have concluded that the size of the thyroid gland—i. e., the degree of goiter—is always in inverse relation to the amount of iodine stored in the gland, which in turn depends directly upon the amount in the diet in available form."

Orange Reaming Urged

The assembled chemists were told by A. J. Lorenz, chemist and director of nutritional research of the California Fruit Growers' Exchange, that to get the most out of their orange juice they should ream the orange and not squeeze it.

His explanation of "squeezing" versus "reaming," though strictly a scientific one, promised in the minds of some observers to provide a future controversy as classic as that which has long ranged over the unconventional but widely practised art of dunking.

"Merely pressing an orange to obtain the juice is wasteful of Vitamin C," Mr. Lorenz explained. "Early in our studies we found that reaming an orange either electrically or by hand thoroughly just to the albedo, or white layer of the skin, yielded a juice some 10 to 12 per cent higher in Vitamin C than the pressure method of extraction, which does not rupture the juice sacs."

Mr. Lorenz also boosted the value of California oranges, bringing to the scientific sessions an echo of the ancient feud between California and Florida citrus fruit growers.

He said he had found, as a result of laboratory tests conducted in New York, Philadelphia and Chicago, as well as in the orange groves of California, that the deeper-colored juice of the California navel oranges yielded a carotene, or pro-Vitamin A, value 152 per cent higher than the light-colored juice of Florida oranges.

General Yen Hsi-shan Of Shanshi Is Ill

Domei

TIENTSIN, Oct. 3—A sensation was caused here today when it was reported that General Yen Hsi-shan, Pacification Commissioner for Shansi and Suiyuan, was in a critical condition following complication of the ulcer of the stomach.

Reports of the Shansi warlord's illness have thrown the provincial monetary situation into considerable confusion with the result that the Shansi paper money has sharply depreciated.

Need For Stable Exchanges Sought By League Body

Time Believed Ripe For Powers To Remove Trade Restrictions

The Economic Committee of the League of Nations in its report to the Council issued on September 14 adopted the view that the moment had arrived for consultations between the principal States with a view to a common policy with regard to the removal of exchange control and restriction of payments and the ultimate stabilization of the exchanges.

The Committee was of opinion that the economic situation has reached the parting of the ways, the one road leading to a worsening of international trade and the other to the normalization of the exchanges, says an article in the London Times which follows:—

To the question whether a new and comprehensive effort is possible to rid international trade of the barriers and obstacles which stand in the way of recovery, the Committee replies that while the idea of another World Conference on the lines of 1933 must be abandoned on account of the diversity of interests, it is convinced that the countries concerned are now more ready to make the necessary concessions. It observes that action must not be left to technicians and interested parties, nor must it be approached with preoccupations of profit and bargaining, but it must be undertaken in the loftier spirit of a contribution to the work of peace and conciliation.

The report gives an account of the conditions resulting from the fall of prices and the respective steps taken by the sterling-dollar group and the gold bloc to protect their trade, in particular quotas, exchange restrictions, and clearing agreements, the expansion of internal credit, and attempts at complete self-sufficiency. All in the long run have proved illusory. In effect they prevent a return to the equilibrium desired and continue to upset the normal course of international trade. The Committee is convinced that the only sound policy is one which will restore liberty of action and will permit the living economic forces to operate with a maximum of ease by the re-establishment of normal relations between the various countries. It does not believe that any attempt at monetary adjustment can succeed unless it is accompanied by relief in respect of quotas and trade barriers.

Stability of Sterling

Whether by deflation or devaluation, the accommodation to external price levels is one that each country must undertake for itself and by its own efforts, but at the same time cooperation by other countries can create conditions in which the operation can be undertaken with a minimum of danger and a maximum of advantage. Such cooperation would diminish the fears of the countries which hesitate to take a decision because they fear a new devaluation of the pound or dollar. "It may be remarked," observes the report, "with regard to the stability of the exchanges that the two principal currencies, the dollar and the pound sterling, have in fact been stable for some long time, and that neither in Great Britain nor in the United States does there exist any desire deliberately to undertake any new devaluation."

While insisting that above all things the normal functioning of the mechanism of international trade must be restored, the Committee realizes that considerable courage will be needed in carrying out the necessary measures. A favorable circumstance which encourages it to believe in the possibility of restoring international economic cooperation is the recovery that has already begun and is proceeding with growing force. The relative rise in prices and the newer methods, even among the most rigorous of control countries, for facilitating trade, have helped to reduce the disparity between the various price levels. Almost all countries are promoting the expansion of internal credit, which is accompanied by increased production.

In the countries with depreciated currencies a sincere desire for stability is manifested, while those which have been most assiduous in maintaining the old parity have begun to experience the serious disadvantages of that course. The political benefits to be derived from a return to the economic normal are not lost sight of. But the Committee utters a warning against anything on too ambitious a scale, and points out that any attempt at international collaboration should be undertaken in the first place by a limited number of countries, and in particular those which play a decisive part in the political as well as the economic domain.

bates on matters relating to their departments and bringing them forward for interrogation as to their departments. Dr. Butler urged the adoption of a bill presented as long ago as 1881 providing for voluntary attendance by Cabinet members in debate and compulsory attendance to give information to either House when so requested.

"Incidentally," Dr. Butler went on, "the introduction of this system would tend to bring men of high type into Cabinet office, for only such men, with administrative ability and full knowledge of their departmental business, could long sustain themselves before either house of Congress."

It was Dr. Butler's belief that a single department of national defense should be created to coordinate the activities of the present war and navy departments. He called for an overhauling of the administration of the Federal Government to eliminate overlapping and duplication. The present system, he said, "represents incompetence gone mad." Imitation by any great industrial organization would result in ruin, he argued.

Seeks Checks on Strikes

Going into regulation of trade disputes, Dr. Butler said:

"There is no good reason why industries, whether great or small, should not be so organized as to recognize the direct interest of the workers in the product of their work and to make the workers feel themselves genuine partners in the undertaking upon which they are engaged."

He conceded that "this happy condition" is still "somewhat in the future." Meanwhile, he said, steps should be taken to prevent disruption of the public welfare by compelling strikes to confine themselves to their declared purposes. He warned that legislation must be effected to protect the general public against general strikes and against lockouts tending to have the same deterrent effect as general strikes.

"A trade union must not be made a privileged class outside the law in respect to civil liberty," said Dr. Butler. "Every trade union should be registered at a public office and its financial holdings and administration should be open to public inspection. Each trade union which holds property should be incorporated and make the annual report required by law to the appropriate public official. * * * If definite legal responsibilities are placed upon trade unions the quality of their leadership will improve. It has been pointed out that for this very reason the labor leadership in England is of the highest quality and that labor racketeering is there quite unknown."

Delay in solving this problem, warned Dr. Butler, "provides new ammunition for those who are laboring to build up permanent class distinctions in the United States, accompanied by a class consciousness and a class ambition which might easily undermine the still strong foundations upon which the democratic system of social organization and of government has always rested and still rests."

In this regard he advocated Federal legislation as to interstate undertakings and State action otherwise.

Russian Cellist Holding First Concert Tonight

of Mr. Casals; we have played chamber music together, and I have played under his baton. I feel more like a grandson to him." Then he went on relating how the Spanish master's name has cropped up in some way every place he has played, and that it was very annoying to him.

Must Become Creative

Speaking of present day artists, he said, "A recreative artist must also be a creative one. He cannot possibly have the proper balance and understanding if he himself has not created. Take all the old virtuosos. They were all composers as well as performers. Today artists are becoming like eye-ear-and-nose specialists. They stick to one instrument, often playing only the works of one composer, and know little of composition."

"Today the virtuoso is being referred to as a degraded person. But there must be virtuosity in a true artist: How else will he be equipped to play? If he does not know his instrument how will he express himself? Even chamber music players should be virtuosos, but, like all good technique, it must not be seen. I may admire a very beautiful painting, but I don't care to see the speed and virtuosity of the artist madly working away at his canvass."

Mr. Piatigorsky's recital tonight is fresh with music not often played. Of particular interest is a sonata by an anonymous composer of the Eighteenth Century which the artist found in the library of the King of Saxony. He will also play the A major Sonata of Beethoven and his transcription of Ravel's Tzigane.

Peaceful Solution Of China Trouble Is Hoped By Sung

Armed Force Should Never Be Used, Declares North China Leader

Domei

PEIPING, Oct. 5—Belief that armed force should never be resorted to in dealing with outstanding questions between Japan and China and none of them would be settled by this resort, was voiced by General Sung Che yuan, chairman of the Hopei-Chahar Political Council, in commenting on the current tense situation in the south, in the course of an interview with press representatives here today.

Despite the troubled situation in South China, General Sung declared that the authorities in the north are prepared to strive for enhancement of welfare of the North China population in accordance with the central authorities' "peace policy."

Questioned about his recent conversations with Lieutenant-General Kwanichiro Tashiro, Commander of the Japanese Garrison in North China, the head of the Political Council indicated that he exchanged views with the Japanese Commander over the projected Sino-Japanese economic cooperation in the north in the course of a series of conferences.

During these conversations, General Sung further indicated, discussions centered around possibility of carrying out by Sino-Japanese collaboration those projects which have remained undecided despite the negotiations between the Japanese and the defunct Peiping Branch of the National Military Council. He added that those unmaterialized projects included construction of railways in the northern provinces and also operation of the Lungyin iron mine.

He said that he stressed that the principle of equality and reciprocity be strictly observed in carrying these plans into execution.

General Sung returned here yesterday from Tientsin after a protracted stay there.

Rightists To Begin New Attack Against Blum Government

Domei

PARIS, Oct. 5.—The repercussion of the week-end street fighting between the police forces and Rightist demonstrators, said to be the worst Paris has ever witnessed, is likely to threaten the upset of the Popular Front Government headed by Socialist Premier Leon Blum, political circles opined here today.

The first indication of lessened support to the Blum Government today came from Saine and Loire Provinces where Radical-Socialists made their parliamentary support of the Socialist cabinet contingent upon a pledge that it exercise strict control over certain foreign elements conspiring against internal order.

A sensation was caused in the meanwhile by a revelation today that Fascists, now pursuing a new line of attack on the Leftist Government, is trying to undermine the loyalty of the national police. It is reported that a fierce attack on the regular police has been launched by the Fascist agents, who are reported in the meantime making overtures to crack mobile guards. It is understood, however, that the Government has so far met the threat quietly by transferring key officers.

Meanwhile, Rightist leaders today announced that they would call upon their followers to stage counter-demonstration against all major Leftist meetings.

Danzig Question May Necessitate League Session

Several Decrees Declared Unconstitutional By Council; Split Becomes Serious

Domei

GENEVA, Oct. 6—Despite the recent concession of the League in recalling Mr. Sean Lester from the Free City of Danzig, an ever-widening split between Geneva and the Danzig Senate is being threatened here today with the passage of a report condemning measures which have of late been pushed through the Free City's Legislature.

A lengthy report by a committee of three on the Danzig question was unanimously passed by the League Council in which several decrees passed by the Danzig Senate were declared unconstitutional. Accompanying the document were also written complaints by Mr. Lester, former League's High Commissioner, against the Senate.

Meanwhile, from Danzig Mr. Arthur Greiser, head of the Nazi Senate, is reported to have forwarded a letter to the League's Secretary-General Joseph Avenol stating: "the Danzig Senate accepts without reserve Mr. Lester's removal." Mr. Greiser, according to reports from Nationalist-Socialist circles, has declined Mr. Avenol's invitation to send delegates to the League Council debate on the Danzig question because of the lateness of the invitation.

The Council after reviewing the report has been asked by the Committee to devise means of restoring the League's former position in the Free City. The Polish Government has also handed a resolution asking the Council to take similar steps.

In return the League Council has asked the committee to pursue its investigation further, but at the same time declared that in view of the importance and seriousness of the situation, it would call a special session should it be necessary.

Pig Psychological Research Is Urged To Learn Human's

The use of the barnyard pig as material for psychological research in solving some difficult problems of human mental disease was suggested recently by Dr. H. S. Liddell, of Cornell University. Dr. Liddell, reporting to the American Psychological Association at Hanover, New Hampshire, pointed out that when a pig is restrained its resistance "is violent and varied, including responses suggesting temper, tantrum and flight from reality in man."

Dr. Liddell "conditioned" his pigs over a period of months to stand quietly in a small area and to respond to a stimulus by lifting the lid of a box and securing an apple, according to the New York Herald Tribune, whose report continues:

"The gradual reduction of space allotted to the pig in its exercise of learning to associate certain signals with food and others with no food simplifies its behavior while tension within its nervous system increase," he declared.

Limitation of the pig's freedom, the Cornell experimenter added, "is a primary factor in the development of the dangerous nervous strain which may lead to experimental neurosis."

The pigs refused to learn, however, that the conditions under which they were fed were similar to those under which they were shocked with an electrical current and therefore it was indicated "that the pig's faith in the nature of its environment can be controlled and modified to suit the experimenter's convenience."

Evidence of the ability of individuals to work equally well with either hand was presented by Paul Campbell Young, of Louisiana State University. He reported the case of an accountant, naturally right handed, who wrote and figured exclusively with his left hand for more than four months with a resulting improvement in his right-handed writing.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Father Of Boxing

San Bernardino (1380-1444), the jovial and charitable Franciscan monk of Siena, Italy, is responsible for the modern revival of boxing. Europe was then torn between the two factions of the Guelphs and the Ghibellines, and blood was being shed in constant battles. Traveling from place to place, the saintly monk acted by great eloquence to calm the sanguine strife. He assembled around him a great many youths, who were fascinated by his word. He taught and prevailed upon them to substitute the fists for swords, and his virtuous and cheerful example brought about the revival of pugilism.

Brundage Praises Germany's Policy

Domei

NEW YORK, Oct. 5—If the United States wishes to maintain its existing institutions, it must like Germany, exterminate all threats of Communism, Mr. Avery Brundage, president of the American Olympic Committee, declared in a public address here tonight.

Back from an extended visit to Germany, he praised the courage of the people pointing out that despite the period of discouragement which hit the nation after the World War, the Germans emerged with greater surges of self-confidence.

Commenting upon the recent Olympic Games he added: "No people since the time of the old Greek nation has had a greater and more sincere national interest in the Olympic spirit than Germany." He said that he would vouch for the statements since during his stay there he got to know the Germans most thoroughly.

Berliners Harvest Notes From Money Incinerator

Old currency notes that had been placed in the incinerator at the Reich printing plant at Berlin not long ago went up the stack and fell in nearby yards.

Residents of a few houses behind the printing plant discovered their gardens were being strewn with paper and rushed out angrily to investigate the outrage to their privacy and their German sense of neatness, says the New York Times. Secretly and joyfully, they harvested 10, 20, 50 and 100 mark notes from their bushes and flower beds.

It did not remain a secret long, so the incinerator in which old currency is burned is equipped with a new screen that keeps notes from being blown from the stack.

Latin-America Stirred By Spanish Revolt

tarians, military officers, professional and others who hardly seemed to belong in such a party.

A pencil dropping on a map of South or Central or Caribbean America, at random, will almost inevitably land on a spot where Fascism, in some form, and Communism, in some form, are in evidence, or where "right" and "left" are the popular issues. Though it has been proved that Latin-American Communism has received more than the moral support of the Soviet Republic, and though it is evident that Latin American Fascism receives more than the moral support of Berlin and Rome, the former by financial aid and the latter by trade and cultural favors, it seems evident to this correspondent that three considerations must be taken into account if the present state of affairs in Latin America is to be understood.

First, long before the Soviet Republic came into being and long before Fascism was born, the trends of political and social division in the key Latin-American countries like Mexico, Chile and Argentina was in the direction of those now apparent and called Communist or Fascist, or "right" and "left."

In the second place, both Communism and Fascism, unconsciously, perhaps, borrowed, imitated or adapted many institutions which were common and commonplace in the Latin American world long before they themselves appeared. Among these are dictatorial rule; state ownership and or control of industry, commerce, communications, censorship; bureaucracy; arbitrary arrest, exile, imprisonment or political assassination; etc.

Thirdly Latin American Fascism and Communism are neither Russian nor Italian or German but very imperfect adaptations of the European models. This becomes crystal clear when the lists of Communist or Fascist leaders of any given Latin American country is closely studied and examined and when Latin American conditions are compared or contrasted with those in Europe.

There is as little similarity between the democracy of the United States and Great Britain, which these countries "adopted" over a century ago, and their present "democratic" institutions, as there is between their present or would-be Fascism and Communism and those of Russia, Italy and Germany. Back of and below all else is a suggestive hint.

In a valiant endeavor to solve serious economic, social and political problems the Latin Americans again have turned to Europe for models. Mexico is, perhaps, the only exception and in many respects this country with its Mexican solution to many of its problems is the best off.

Municipal Parks Scenes Of Crimes Declare NY Police

Authorities Conclude Better Protection Needed To End Park Crimes

By RUSSELL OWEN

N. Y. Times

The request by Police Commissioner Valentine for more policemen, partly that he might give more protection to those who wish to enjoy the public parks, has again centered attention on the problem of crime in the parks. It is one of the ironies of city administration that as the parks have been made more attractive by the planting of more shrubbery and trees they have at the same time become more dangerous because the increased cover provides hiding places for the criminally inclined.

When Commissioner Valentine said that the parks were sometimes unsafe for women even in the daytime, and at night were unsafe for strong men, he was not overstating the fact. Detectives have been known to say they would not care to walk alone in dark portions of some parks. Often patrolmen have been sent out in pairs in particularly dangerous sections. The man who walks alone in upper Central Park at night takes a chance not merely of being robbed but of being murdered.

The parks which are the most dangerous are Central Park—particularly in its northern area—Morningside, Riverside and Mount Morris Parks. Criminals frequent these places to rob and attack men as well as women. Henry Goddard Leach, editor of Forum, was beaten within an inch of his life by thugs while he was walking in the afternoon around the site of the old Central Park reservoir.

Serious Park Crimes

Many sorts of crime are committed in the city's parks, most of them of course in the parks of Manhattan. A study of the statistics of arrests made of the Summer period of 1935 for the Park Association—which are the latest available—shows what the police can do when they concentrate upon the prevention and punishment of crime in the parks. In August last year there was a roundup of vagrants and criminals found loitering in parks.

Up to that time the arrests had been mostly for petty misdemeanors such as peddling, intoxication and a few more serious acts. But when the police went into action the arrests for prostitution, degeneracy, assault and robbery began to mount. The seriousness of the situation was disclosed by the figures, and nobody in the Police Department would pretend that the situation had changed very much this year, although vigilance has suppressed some of the worst offences.

Homicides are not unknown in the parks. A woman has been killed in Morningside Park, and the escort of a young woman was murdered in Central Park. There was another homicide in Central Park not many months ago. A clergyman, attacked on the West Drive of Central Park, lost an eye as the result of his struggle with thugs who jumped out of the bushes.

Parks Widely Used

The worst feature of the situation is that the parks have never been so popular and so much used, partly because of the city's growing population and also because under Robert Moses they have been developed and expanded far beyond anything the city ever knew before. In the afternoons in warm weather they are crowded, and the increased shade from new trees and shrubbery has made them a consolation during the torrid days. They have given new force to the old line: "Where every prospect pleases and only man is vile."

Not so many years ago the parks were as safe as any other part of New York City. Riding about the parks leisurely in a hansom cab was one of the delights of the generation before prohibition. No highwaymen jumped out of bushes then. But in the last decade all the influences that have caused petty crime and degeneracy, as well as the shifting southward of the mixed populations of Harlem, have made the parks perilous places for those who go there in the evening. The time when most crimes occur is between 8 and 10 at night, when the parks are most used.

The Only Remedy

"I could make the parks safe by putting a fence around them, so that when anything happened we could close the gates and examine everybody coming out," said a policeman. "But I doubt if a wire fence would add to their beauty. Outside of a fence, the only way I can think of making the parks safer is to have more policemen to patrol them. There is a lot of territory in Central Park and lots of places for a thug to hide."

The crimes in Morningside Park are almost exclusively by Negroes. Its lower level is close to a Negro section, but the park is cut off from Morningside Heights by a wall of stone. When violence has aroused the people of the neighborhood, including the law-abiding Negroes, who greatly outnumber the criminal elements, police patrols have been doubled there. But when order was restored the police were withdrawn for duty in other troublesome areas. For Harlem is at a tension at present, due to unemployment and radical activities and racial antagonisms.

Mount Morris Park, for instance, is a battleground between the American Negroes who live to the north of it and the Spanish-speaking Negroes who live to the south. They do not like each other. As they both come into contact with the Italians of the east side the rocky summits of Mount Morris Park are often the meeting place of groups who do not hesitate to use knife, club or pistol.

Even in Riverside Park, which used to be among the safest and most respectable of neighborhoods, there is now danger, especially after nightfall, if one goes far from the Drive. A woman sitting there in the evening is apt to be accosted, and if no one is within sight she may be robbed of her purse. If she resists she may be seriously injured. And this at a period when the park has never been so well kept or more attractive to those who wish to relax in the places which the city has set aside for that purpose.

Police Handicaps

The police do the best they can, but they are handicapped by the necessity of policing a city of more than 7,000,000 people which extends for many miles in various directions. There are less than 17,000 policemen at present and of these about 1,500 are detectives. Many more are attached to the traffic squads, to special squads and the inspectors' offices. When the remainder are broken into three platoons it is found that perhaps not more than 4,500 policemen are on patrol at any one time.

There are usually less than twenty-five men on patrol in Central Park, which is the only park, other than Prospect Park in Brooklyn, to have its own police station. Other parks are patrolled by details from bordering precincts.

It has been found that when policemen are placed on fixed posts in a park, commanding a fairly wide view, few crimes are committed near them. But the terrain of Central Park, for instance, is so broken and rolling that no fixed post can command a very large area. There are three radio cars also on Central Park patrol, but they are of course confined to the driveways. Riverside Park drops sharply toward the river and much of it is out of sight of patrolmen on the Drive, paricularly at night. Morningside Park is fairly level and should be the easiest of all to protect.

Apparently, provision of more policemen, as Commissioner Valentine demands, is the only way in which the park crime problem may be met. It was argued at the budget hearing that the police would partly pay for themselves by preventing the $500,000 damage from vandalism which occurs every year in the parks. For there is a certain type of New Yorker who seems to delight in tearing down and destroying whatever is erected or cultivated for the pleasure of the people as a whole. But vandalism is a small part of the park crime problem.

Huxley Envisages Higher Brain Level

But he cautioned against the copying of nature's methods.

Denies Process Is Divine

"Not only is natural selection not an instrument of divine purpose," he said, "it is not even the best mechanism for achieving evolutionary progress, and this because the survivals of natural selection are as likely to be esthetically, morally or intellectually repulsive as attractive and socially desirable.

"Natural selection has few attributes that can be called divine. It is efficient in its way, but at the price of extreme slowness and cruelty.

"Another struggle still in progress is between the idea of purpose directed to a future life and one directed to the existing world. Until such major conflicts are resolved, humanity can have no single major purpose and progress can be but fitful and slow."

It is not inevitable that man's evolutionary progress will continue, Professor Huxley contended. Control of environment is increasing. But this very control interferes with the process of natural selection, which determines what living types of animal, man included, shall survive. In other words, man has already taken his biological destiny in hand.

"Man must work and plan," Professor Huxley concluded, "if he is to achieve further progress for himself and so for life."

Creation of Planets Pictured

Such eminent physicists as Sir James Jeans, Dr. Harold Jeffereys, Dr. Edward Arthur Milne and Professors William Marshall Smart and R. A. Lyttleton projected themselves backward in time billions of years and in their mathematical minds saw planets torn out of the sun and satellites formed—in short, saw the creation of the solar system. Sir James opened the discussion by presenting the conditions that any theory of planetary origins must satisfy.

"No theory can pass all tests with flying colors," he pointed out.

It is apparent, he said, that the more astrophysicists discover about the stars the more difficult it is to explain how the solar system came into being. According to the theory developed by Laplace in the eighteenth century, the sun originally extended to the outermost planetary orbit and shed the planets as it shrank to its present size. In the act of shedding, its speed of rotation increased.

But, Sir James pointed out, this violates one of the fundamental principles that the theory must meet. There is no reason to suppose that the sun's speed of rotation is much different today from what it was 10,000,000,000 years ago.

Teeth Are Grown In Hind Leg Of Rat

Harvard Dental School Hear Of Experiments In Bone Development

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Sept. 16—Experiments in which the undeveloped teeth of a rat embryo were transplanted and made to grow in the hind leg of the mother animal were described here today before the tercentenary session of the Harvard Dental School and the Harvard Dental Alumni Association, according to the New York Times.

The experiments, it was made clear, were not carried out with a view of creating an animal that could kick and bite at the same time. Nor were they meant to be taken as foreshadowing an era of "teething rings for grandmothers" by carrying the experiments to the stage of transplanting the mandibles of prematurely born humans into adults.

The intention of the experiments, it was pointed out by Dr. Lawrence W. Baker, who made the report, was to find out the influences which cause the growth of bones.

"I have found," Dr. Baker reported, "that there are two sets of influences which cause bones to grow, and which enable the bones of the face and head to develop.

"One set is pre-natal. It is inherent in the bone in the germ plasm. The other set is post-natal and is functional.

"Through successful transplants, we are able to separate these two great growth influences and thus study these forces in isolation."

Enables Study of Bone Growth

"I have believed that by transplanting teeth and their supporting structures while in their embryonic state," Dr. Baker continued, "we could study the growth of these parts in a new environment and in isolation. Thus further knowledge might be gained not only about these structures but about the influences of their growth forces upon the development of the bones of the face and internal bony structure of the head.

"As a result valuable information could be placed at the disposal of all who work upon this important part of the human body, the head."

The "sites" selected for transplantation of the embryo mandibles have been the eye, leg muscles and the brain, Dr. Baker said, and continued:

"We succeeded in obtaining 'takes' in all three structures. It was found, however, that the best results were obtained in muscle, probably because of the fact that the transplanted bone was in its most normal environment, functioning striated muscle."

Dr. Baker and his associates transplanted half of an embryonic rat mandible, taken three days before birth, and compared it with the other untransplanted half of the same mandible forty days after the transplant. The transplanted half had grown considerably, while the non-transplanted half remained the same.

Pre-Natal Factor Determined

In this way the pre-natal growth factor could be determined. The growth of the transplanted half of the mandible was then compared with the growth of a normal mandible after forty days. The growth was larger in size but the shape in both cases was the same.

In this manner the post-natal growth factor was separated from the pre-natal factor.

"Evidently," Dr. Baker stated, "the inherent, prenatal developmental forces are very strong, for the body of the transplant, with its complex forms, have all taken definite shape.

"That so much of the architectural plan of this complex bone, which develops from multiple centers of ossification and which contains the intricate and constantly growing dental apparatus, appears to be determined within the germ plasm, is indeed remarkable."

The transplant of the mandible into the brain, Dr. Baker added, throws some light on the reason why infections of the brain are relatively rare.

The reason was attributed to the existence of a certain barrier in the blood vessels of the brain, particularly the capillaries, which resist the ingress of infectious bacteria to the brain.

League Reform Plans Agree On Need Of US Aid

Covenant of the League should be coordinated with the Kellogg pact and the Argentine pact of non-aggression. It states:

Differ on Collective Security

Sharp diversity of opinion is revealed by those states submitting reform proposals concerning the system of collective security. Thus, while some nations like France and Soviet Russia put forward proposals exclusively concerned with the development of collective security, other governments, particularly the Scandinavian bloc, urge the League's function of preventing war by the effective settlement of international disputes.

Baltic states like Latvia and Lithuania say that "the essential task of the League of Nations is to safeguard the security of its members and the inviolability of their territories," and insist that "any reform of the Covenant must center on the provisions relating to repressive measures, that is to say to the question of Article XVI."

Urging more teeth in the Covenant, the New Zealand government says "we are prepared to the extent of our power to join in the collective application of force against any future aggressor," and, referring to general sanctions, it states they will be ineffective unless any sanctions that may be applied are supported by the certainty that the members of the League applying are able and if necessary prepared to use force against force."

At the other end of the scale, however, Argentina, Peru and Switzerland threw doubts on the principle of collective security and of its application under existing conditions. The Argentine note expressed the opinion that "it should be considered that the provisions of the Covenant have been shown by experience to be no longer in keeping with the realities of international life, and these provisions should be given an optional character instead of the character of strict obligation."

Switzerland objected to the sanctions system on the ground that it created inequalities, since sanctions cannot be applied in all cases and because the risks entailed by sanctions are not identical for every power.

And Hungary, pressing for revision, protested against the notion that the League's task should be exclusively to assume a strict application of the punitive provisions of the Covenant. The Budapest government declared that it "would like to bring the punitive provisions into equilibrium with the other provisions of the Covenant which—in particular Articles XI, XIII and XIX—provide pacific and preventive means of settling disputes that may arise between states which are members, and offer the possibility of remedying situations the maintenance of which might imperil world peace."

Harvard Greets World Scholars; Stresses Unity

nent presidents, to give them the opportunity of self-development through self-effort, and of thus liberating their own deeper personalities.

"Here they have learned the primacy of spiritual values. In this land, where the development of techniques based on scientific knowledge reached its height, you have always held that science, apart from its practical applications has a value of its own as a means of culture for the soul; that, like the humanities, it has its place along the highest of liberating disciplines.

"But if knowledge liberates man, no barrier, political, religious or social, should be erected to stop the search for truth. It may well be your pride that you have always fought uncompromisingly for the maintenance of the principle of freedom of research.

"Like Harvard University, every one of our universities has developed according to its own law; but all have value only as members of one and the same society, consecrated to a collective task which at once unites and surpasses them all—the quest of truth. In this society, we must continue to stand united.

"By the initiative which you have taken of founding exchange professorships, you have helped us to know and to understand one another better, and you have shown how much you value the cooperation across national boundaries of representatives of the knowledge and the thought of the races. You are giving a striking proof of it on this day in the way you have conceived the commemoration of your third centenary. If the world, emerging from the trouble and anxiety of the present hour, may at some future time find a spiritual unity more universal and more stable than that which Christendom enjoyed in the Middle Ages, it pleases us to think that Harvard University, by the organization of the conference of arts and sciences, will have helped us in the search for this unity.

"To Harvard University, active promoter of international cooperation, burning hearth of high culture, sanctuary of free research, we offer our best wishes that she may know long centuries of prosperity for the good of humanity."

The Dalai Lama

This dignitary who is the worldly and spiritual ruler of Tibet, is believed to be a reincarnation of Bodisatva, the elect of God. The title Dalai Lama means the "Ocean of Priests." When a Dalai Lama dies, his successor is chosen from among the babies born at the identical moment of the ruler's death. They are then believed to have become possessed of his soul and are given long and extravagant names to bear in the office for which they are destined.

Town Built Over A River

The fact that a river, a (tributary of the Lehigh River), flowed through the site where they wanted to build a town, didn't bother the founders of Mauch Chunk, Pa. They built stone archways over the river, and constructed houses, theaters and churches over the arches. The town is primarily a one street town, the single street and underground river running its entire length. My sketch shows the point where the river enters the town.

FORMER JAPAN RESIDENT DIES

A cable from England announces the death after a long illness of Mrs. Hilda Heaslett, wife of the Most Rev. Samual Heaslett D.D., Bishop in South Tokyo, which took place at Southport, Lancashire, England, Friday, October 9.

Mrs. Heaslett first came to Japan as a C.M.S. missionary in 1894 and worked in Osaka until after her marriage to the Rev. S. Heaslett, also a C.M.S. missionary who arrived in Japan in 1900. After their marriage Mr. and Mrs. Heaslett worked for five years in Tokushima, before she was transferred to Tokyo, where Mr. Heaslett was appointed to the staff of the Central Theological College, Ikebukuro. In 1922 Mr. Heaslett was consecrated Bishop in South Tokyo and in 1926 he and Mrs. Heaslett moved to Yokohama the chief city of the diocese. Mrs. Heaslett had a breakdown in health in 1933 and though she recoverd sufficiently to make the journey home on furlough in 1934, she soon had a relapse and had remained an invalid for the last two years.

ARRIVED IN TOKYO

Mr. and Mrs. G.S. Carey, who have been away to England on furlough returned to Japan Sunday by the Hikawa Maru.

WOMAN'S CLUB CONCERT

The meeting of the Woman's Club Monday was at the Swiss Legation through the kind hospitality of Madame Turnheer. The program was a concert by Miss Hiroko Iwaya, soprano, and Miss Anni Victorius, well-known pianist.

Miss Iwaya sang Pastorella, Wohin from Schubert, Der Wanderer, and Staendchen. She also sang such songs as Home Sweet Home, Old Folks at Home and two Japanese songs called Autumn Moon and Cake and Girl. Miss Victorius played a Fantasia D minor and Sonata F major from Mozart. That composed the first part of the program. After the interval Miss Victorius played 32 Variations C minor from Beethoven and Miss Iwaya sang an aria from Verdi's La Traviata, "as fors'e lui".

The concert was thoroughly enjoyed by all who were present. After the entertainment the club was invited by Madame Turnheer to have tea at the Legation.

Poole Declares 2 Factors Stay War In Europe

Princeton Man Tells Ocean City Conference Nations Can See Coming Strife

N.Y. Herald Tribune

OCEAN CITY, N. J., Sept. 12—Europe today is on the verge of a second world war, De Witt Clinton Poole, director of the School of Public and International Affairs at Princeton University, said today at the final session of the first Ocean City conference on the "Economic Problems of Business and Industry." Only two factors, Dr. Poole said, can forestall the general conflict: that all nations are aware of the danger and may act to prevent a war, and that no nation, with the exception of France, was in a military position dominant enough to take the offensive

Dr. Poole, who returned last week from Europe, said that he found Russia drifting away from internationalism and that Josef Stalin, Russia's dictator, was building up a nationalistic state. Russia, he said, was giving up the idea of world revolution.

Dr. Marcus Nadler, research director of the Institute of International Finance, of New York University, said that there was no possibility of a return to the gold standard in the United States or in any other country as long as economic nationalism continued to prevail. Dr. Nadler predicted that this country would have a period of relative stability of currency, even though there would be no return to the gold basis.

He cited the real reason for countries not returning to the gold standard is because Great Britain is waiting to find out the future currency policy of the United States. The British, in his opinion, are the key to the situation, and are the main problem confronting the return to this standard.

Dr. Ernest M. Patterson, president of the American Academy of Political and Social Sciences, who presided at the final session, also gave a brief address claiming that extreme fluctuations in the money market hamper long-range business projects as well as virtually paralyzing export and import trade.

Dr. Ralph A. Young, of the University of Pennsylvania, declared that the continuation of recovery depended on the perpetuation of liberal Federal spending.

Irish Youth Goes To England to Get Some Employment

Scarcity Of Jobs And Training Among Reasons For Leaving Home

DUBLIN.—Although they are willing enough to shout "Up the Republic" and to cast their first votes at twenty-one for Eamon de Valera, the young people of the Irish Free State are finding that England offers much better opportunities for employment than does their own country, says the N. Y. Herald Tribune.

The intensified drive toward industrialism which has been the feaure of Free State policy for four years undoubtedly has opened many avenues of profitable employment to boys and girls, but the girls have found the opportunities much more numerous than the boys. In consequence, "What to do with our boys" is the pressing problem in hundreds of homes in all parts of the Free State. The problem is pressing in the cities and larger towns, but even in the country it has now become acute. The smallest post in the civil service—that of telegraphic delivery messenger, for example—will have hundreds of applicants for every vacancy.

A similar state of affairs is to be noted whenever a new factory is projected. Hundreds of boys an girls and even many adults, too, proceed at once to bombard every one who may be suspected of influence in filling positions. The effect of this is that a very careful selection of the types needed can be made, and when they have been selected they may be subjected to a period of training either at home or in England before the factory starts operations.

Technical and vocational training schools in all parts of the Free State have been utilized to impart this preliminary training and hundreds of youths have been sent for training to many parts of England. Birmingham, Coventry, West Bromwich, Wolverhampton, Norwich, Kettering and Northampton have given something of the their traditional skill to these appentices. Sheffield and the potteries have trained the earliest cultery workers for Newbridge and the pottery workers of Arklow; and the latest center for training is Bradford.

Recently thirty-two girls left Maryborough for training in the Yorkshire town, and when they return they will be employed in the factory to be opened soon by the owners of the Yorkshire factories in which they are now receiving training. Instead of importing English manufactured goods, the Free State is now importing the traditional industrial skill of England.

In addition to this constant stream of apprentices there is another stream that is causing some alarmed discussion on both side of the Irish Sea—the continuous stream of young people leaving the Free State to seek employment in England. This problem has become marked, and even has been on the agenda of the General Council of County Councils.

Supporters of the government deny stoutly that this emigration has increased enormously during the last two years, but despite this denial there is cumulative evidence that hundreds are leaving the Free State every month for England. The extraordinary thing is that they succeed in getting jobs; in one case an entire family of six followed the pioneering lead of a boy of sixteen, and all are now employed in southern England.

Landslide Causes Norwegian Tragedy

of western Norway. A barrier of rock separates it from the main fjord and the sea, raising its level to a height of some 289 feet above sea level.

"Visitors and fishermen generally approach the lake by boat, landing at the village of Loen, at the head of Invikfjord. From there to Lake Loen they follow a modern road, paralleling a dashing stream that serves as an outlet of the lake.

"Meadows, lush and green, along the shore soon give way to a strip sheer rocky heights, topped by snow-clad peaks and glaciers. The scenery is grand and impressive, and scores of beetling precipices, dashing waterfalls, and islets seem to pass in review as the lake steamer plows along, leaving rippling furrows on the pale green surface of the water.

Spectacular Ice and Water Falls

"The lake itself is about 10 miles long. Except for a few knifelike ravines, it is entirely surrounded by huge precipices nearly 5,000 feet high, with mountain peaks towering another 1,000 to 1,500 feet above the clifftops. Between many of the peaks huge glaciers descend, but all of them are transformed into waterfalls before they to reach the lake. When clouds hang low in the region these falls seem to drop out of the mist.

"One of the most spectacular sights in western Norway is a glacier which periodically breaks off from the brow of a cliff on the western shore of the lake. In summer large masses of ice are detached, plunging a sheer 3,900 feet with a rumble like thunder, to dash to pieces among the rocks at the water's edge. Often accumulated ice fragments are spread out in a great fan-shaped pile below.

"Most impressive of the lake's rock walls is the steep, serrated face of Ravenfjeld, source of the avalanches that caused both the 1905 and recent disasters. Near the southeast end of the lake, this stern 6,575-foot cliff faces three of the principal hamlets of the region and a number of scattered gaards, or homesteads, inhabitants sometimes do not see the sun at all during the winter months.

"Scars of the 1905 avalanche, when a stupendous crag detached itself and plunged into the lake, can still be seen. This slide was recalled by a memorial stone on a low rock by the lake.

"The villages of Noesdal and Boedal, which were reported virtually destroyed by the recent wave, hug the shore across the lake from the Ravnefjeld. They again felt the full force of the giant waves set up by the tons of rock hurled into the water. Many of the houses had been moved up the shore since the 1905 catastrope, but still not far enough.

Effect Of Currency Policy On Recovery

League Studies Reveal Reasons For Recovery And Stagnation In World

GENEVA,—Intelligence Service is the name of a British secret organization to which have been attributed legendary activities. Now the League of Nations has set up an Economic Intelligence Service, which does not directly attempt to control events but which nevertheless by its reports and observations, exercises no little influence.

The service has just published a short world monetary review which should be found extremely useful. The factual data on which it is based—drawn largely from the various publications of the League of Nations on production, trade, balances of payments, prices, public finances and the world economic situation in general—are analyzed in their relation to purely monetary changes: "An attempt is made to explain the contrast between the position in certain countries, in which a marked business recovery has been apparent since 1935, and others in which the stagnation continues, in the light of the influence of monetary developments."

Money Developments Classified

There are natural divisions into which the nationse fall. They are thus defined: "One group consists of countries like the United Kingdom, in which expansion in the monetary sense has been mainly a consequence of banking policy. Sweden, South Africa, Australia and Canada belong to this group. A second group comprises Japan, Chile, the United States and Germany, in which the expansion has been mainly a result of the system of financing public expenditure. The gold bloc countries (France, the Netherlands and Switzerland), in which the budgets have shown deficits while credit has not been expanded, form a third group. Finally, there are the experiments in Belgium and Czechoslovakia, in which devaluation has been put through under special conditions."

Some notes, in summarized form, of the information given, follow. First, the sterling bloc: 'In all five countries the expansion of the currency has been due, in the main, either to the policy of the central banks (market interventions and reduction of the official bank rates) or to improvements in the balance of international payments or to both factors operating at once.

"As money has become abundant, rates for money have declined. Conversion operations have been successfully carried through, and the banks have been induced thereby to reduce the rate of interest for deposits, and so to encourage the movement of capital to the securities and commodity markets. The result has been to arrest the decline in prices, and to restore confidence on the part of private enterprise; capital investment on the part of leaders of industry has recommenced and has pointed the way toward economic recovery."

Japan's Bank Law

Financial action by the state, as in the United States, Japan, Germany, and Chile, has also determined economic recovery and monetary expansion. "In Japan, where the gold standard was abandoned in 1931 and the yen lost 60 per cent of its value, the expansion of the circulation is reflected in the amendment made at the beginning of 1932 in the Bank Law of the Bank of Japan. The total circulation increased by some 80 per cent between October, 1931 and October, 1935 (from 4.5 to 8.2 milliards of yens). It is interesting to see how despite the floating of loans, the yield on government stocks, which at the beginning of 1931 was more than 6 per cent, fell to 4 per cent at the end of 1935.

"The effects of the deflation in Chile, a country producing raw materials and depending on foreign trade, is shown by the 35 per cent reduction in current accounts between 1929 and the third quarter of 1931. The subsequent inflation took the form mainly of state borrowing from the central bank, which had its corollary in a marked depreciation of the exchange, the (free) market rate falling to 20 per cent of the 1933 figure.

Liquidity Features U. S.

"The chief feature of the monetary situation in the United States has been the accumulation by the commercial banks of very large sums, which has led to conditions of exceptional liquidity in the money market. The principal use made by the banks of these increased resources between the end of 1929 and the end of 1935 was for the purchase of federal stocks and bonds with a federal guarantee. As however the amounts borrowed by the administration were expended by the administration, they have found their way back to the banks either in the form of repayment of bank advances or in the form of deposits. The figures of the bank balance sheets show that the increase in the national debt of the United States—which rose from 22½ to 30½ millairds of dollars between the middle of 1933 and the end of 1935, while the funds at the disposal of the federal treasury during the same period increased by 1.35 millairds of dollars—was taken up in its entirety by the banks.

Germany's Situation

"In Germany the economic and monetary situation has been dominated since the beginning of 1933 by heavy government expenditure, or expenditure with a government guarantee, on rearmament, public works, etc. The index of industrial production rose between 1932 and 1935 from 53.3 to 94.1 per cent of the 1929 figure, and the number of unemployed covered by the official statistics declined from 5.5 to 2.15 millions (not including persons employed in labor camps). The state expenditure has been covered by the issue of treasury and other bonds of the Reich and the federal states and by special bills issued for the purpose."

Few signs of recovery are seen in the gold bloc countries. It is declared: "The characteristic features since the spring of 1933 are, briefly, an increase of hoarding with a preference for gold rather than notes, an extension of international speculation to the detriment of national currencies, heavy budgetary deficits covered mainly by borrowing on the internal capital market with a resulting decrease in the supply, and increase in the demand for capital, with its corollary in the form of higher interest rates, says the Christian Science Monitor.

"Prices have continued to fall; but the fall has not been sufficient to offset the 'under-valuing' of the currencies of the sterling-dollar group. Imports have been rigorously restricted in the hope of improving trade balances; but the "over-valuing' of the gold currencies has led to a contraction of trade and tourist traffic. The decline of economic activities and the contraction in revenue returns as a result of the deflation have had their effects on the balancing of budgets, and have led to increased taxation which has still further reduced the margin of profit and in some cases made it necessary to grant state subsidies to private enterprise. The heavy budget deficits have had to be met by borrowing in spite of the efforts made to cut expenditure."

Some Results of Devaluation

With regard to Belgium and Czechoslovakia, they are small industrial countries dependent on foreign trade. Belgium was obliged to devalue to end deflation, re-create possibilities of commercial profits, encourage the home market, and mitigate the banking crisis.

Czechoslovakia's object in devaluation was to adjust prices to world prices. The different results of the experiments of devaluation (16½ per cent in Czechoslovakia and 28 per cent in Belgium) are thus stated: "In Czechoslovakia the whole of the profit on the revaluation of the gold holdings of the National Bank went to repay state debts to the bank. In Belgium a part of the profit realized was made available for the benefit of the Belgian national economy. The improvement in the foreign trade of Czechoslovakia as a result of devaluation was not followed by any increase in the note circulation. In Belgium the note circulation increased, party as a result of Belgian government action, and partly as a result of an influx of foreign capital. In Belgium, moreover, steps were taken to reduce the rate of interest on long-term investments.

London Radio Fans See Television

crystal set.

New Valve Shown

One newcomer to the radio field, Harries, offered a valve, or tube, which it claimed could be used in any position in any set. It has an 8-pin base, which is not standard, but this could probably be arranged if the valves prove sound. Its use would certainly simplify the tube question in sets which use several types.

If British listeners cared to go out to Alexandra Palace in north London, they could see the television home of the B. B. C., which supplied the Radiolympia show.

At present television in Britain is in the hands of two companies, Baird and Marconi-E. M. I. These radiocast alternately and the B. B. C. supplies the accompanying sound.

Wavelength Used

The wavelength used, 6.67 meters, is receivable generally only within visual distance so that height is an important factor in transmission. Consequently, a 200-foot lattice mast has been built atop one of the towers of Alexandra Palace. As the palace is over 600 feet above sea level and the tower is 80 feet high, the transmitting aerial has a total effective height of over 900 feet.

The Baird system provides for three types of transmission. One is Mr. Baird's original method of scanning the picture to be televised by a spot light. This is used in the studio only. The second is the intermediate film method. In this system the scenes are photographed on half-size films, developed and fixed in less than one minute, and transmitted from the positive film. The third method uses the ordinary cinema film from which vision and sound are radiocast simultaneously.

Marconi-E. M. I. employs an Emirtron camera which can be used either indoors or outdoors. In a press demonstration recently one could see people walking about the Palace grounds. Definition does not equal that of televised film, however.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

League of Pacific Nations Advocated By Sydney Writer

SYDNEY, New South Wales—A correspondent of a Sydney newspaper has made a suggestion for a peace conference in this city during Australia's 150th anniversary celebrations early in 1938, reports a special correspondent to the Christian Science Monitor.

"Plans are on foot for bringing to Port Jackson in 1938 warships of many nations," he says. "Why not also hold a great international peace conference here then. Australia, which has never known an invasion (except that wholly beneficent and mostly peaceful influx of the white race), whose havens are the haunts of peace, is surely an ideal setting for such a conference.

"It is suggested that the time is ripe for a League of Pacific Peoples. It is all very well to talk of the League of Nations, but two great Pacific powers, Japan and the United States, are outside the League and seem likely to stay out. They might, however, join a league that would be both Pacific and pacific.

"Other nations which are either wholly or in part Pacific powers are Soviet Russia, China, France (through its colonies), the Netherlands Indies, Siam, the Philippines, Portugal, New Zealand, Canada, Mexico, the Central American States, Colombia, Ecuador, Peru and Chile. Great Britain, apart from its concern in the dominions, has many possessions in the Pacific. Surely 1938 would be an excellent occasion to gather representatives of all these Pacific powers in Sydney and to launch some such Pacific league. Nor is there any reason why representatives of Germany, Italy, Spain, Argentina, Brazil, the Scandinavian countries and other powers, should not be invited to confer here."

English Girls Find Real Buys In U.S. Stores

NEW YORK, Sept. 23—While department stores of the United States are full of bargains for the serious young shopper from England, "truly American trinkets" for her more frivolous nature are scarce. Furthermore, newspaper reporters along the Atlantic seaboard ask "silly" questions.

Such were the observations of 24 English girls who left here for home in the Queen Mary today, after a month in this country on a tour arranged by the International Friendship League of Boston, the group was in charge of the Misses Edna and Margaret MacDonaugh, of the league. And was made up of daughters of London Rotarians.

Failing to find the proverbial statuettes of "Lady Liberty" and the Empire State building "interesting," the young ladies turned to heavier pursuits than souvenir-hunting on their last day here. One of them changed places with an elevator operator in the Woolworth tower and gave her friends a "lift" to the sixtieth story. Another looked in vain for an opportunity up to the last minute to drive a tram, reports the Christian Science Monitor.

Dancing and "bun-fights," known more conservatively as tea parties, brightened their stay here, reaching a climax in a midnight supper in the Rainbow room at Rockefeller Center.

Shopping for clothes was a daily delight in the cities they visited, including Boston, Washington, Philadelphia, Buffalo and New York. Sixteen dresses were not too many for one of them to buy, since "better values in style and quality" were found here, she explained, than at home.

But when it came to smaller items designed to amuse the reminiscent eye when glancing back over "that month in the United States"—these, paradoxically, had to come from foreign goods imported here.

And the reporters? What do they think an English schoolgirl thinks about? Boys. Apparently nothing else!

Tourists Take $750,000 Goods Back To Canada

tourist traffic is at a peak are: May, $107,000; June, $316,000; July, $328,000.

In each of the three months clothing accounted for more than half the total imported. Next was furniture and household appliances, including such articles as small refrigerators and radios. Third, were boots and shoes. Well up on the list were automobile accessories, such as tires, radios and heaters.

Western Canada tourists have been protesting a recent Customs Department ruling that radios and tires brought into Canada attached to the car cannot be classed as travellers' baggage.

Border officials were harassed by enterprising countrymen arriving at ports of entry with bathtubs roped to the running boards of their cars, and furnace blowers and other bulky pieces of machinery propped up in the back seat. Ottawa ruled that baggage is what railways will accept as such, and no rack in day coach or parlor car will hold a bathtub. Portable radios may be brought over unattached, and tires or batteries may be carried in the car, but not on the car; that is, not installed. In each case the returning Canadian must have been absent from the country for forty-eight hours or more.

Some criticism has been leveled at the regulations on the ground that in some instances they tend to defeat their own purpose. In the case of the automobile radios, heaters and tires it is argued that the rule should be reversed, since it must be the intention of the Customs Department to exempt goods purchased for the tourists' own use, but not for resale or transfer to another person. Its installation at the place of purchase in the United States would be evidence of good faith, the critics say. Another anomaly is seen in the fact that boots and shoes are free if carried in the traveller's baggage, or in his hand, but dutiable if he is wearing them.

Goods must accompany the traveller. He cannot send them by freight or express and claim exemption. Nor can he bring in $25 worth at one time and four months later, on a second trip, return with $175 worth and claim an exemption of $200.

He is not permitted to have repairs made to his car nor to replace parts under the exemption clause, unless such parts are required by reason of an accident.

Customs officials at Ottawa are understood to be satisfied with the results of the exemption, which is part of the Ottawa-Washington trade agreement, feeling that the reciprocal arrangement is the least the government can offer when Canadian purchases in the United States are very small compared with goods bought in this country by American tourists, whose numbers this year may set a record. Last year the estimated revenue Canada derived from tourists was estimated at more than $200,000,000, and this year approximately $300,000,000 is expected.

Women Workers In Britain Gain In Union Ranks

LONDON,—The woman trade unionist is, according to statistics issued recently by the Labor Research department, a less unfamiliar figure than she used to be.

Woman has always been accused of an almost complete disinclination to "organize." Upon this supposed disinclination, the responsibility for many of her economic difficulties has been placed. Moreover, she has borne the severest criticism of the men she has undercut by reason of her individual freedom to accept wages not accepted by organized workers, says the Christian Science Monitor.

But, according to the Labor Research department, she is not nearly so anti-organization as she used to be. The department—which is an unofficial agency which exists for the purpose of making researches into the knotty problems of British labor—says that women are entering trade unions more rapidly than is generally supposed.

In 1913, the total membership of trade unions, which stood at 4,135,000, numbered only 433,000 women, or roughly one ninth of the whole. In 1934, the total membership stood at 4,067,000, and the number of women was 736,000, or, of the whole, about one sixth.

Trade unionism is not a new proposition to the woman worker. In 1876, women formed nearly half the membership of the cotton weavers' associations. Before that, in 1818, they had drawn equal strike pay with men during the spinners' strike. But it was mainly in these textile trades that women had learned how to stand together with each other and with men in defense of their rights.

Now, according to the Labor Research department, workers of other occupations are learning the wisdom of collective action. According to the figures of the 1931 census, which are the latest available, the women of the paper and printing industries are organized up to 33 per cent, while women teachers have reached a percentage of 74.

Heresy Hunt: Quick Sequel To Red Trials

ing him to the authorities.

Called "Vicious Enemy"

The director of a linen factory at Smolensk, who was once an assistant of Zinovieff but openly repented his connection and denounced his former associates, has been expelled and dismissed because he allegedly wrote letters to one of his former associates in exile. The newspaper Pravda declared: "Although this vicious enemy has held very high posts, no one has denounced him before."

The most serious-minded Communist ideologists, such as Emelyan Yaroslavsky, are now signing their names to newspaper articles making the fantastic charge that Leon Trotzky has plotted with the German Gestapo (National Socialist police) against the life of Joseph Stalin and other Soviet leaders. It is difficult for an outsider to believe that this charge could be taken seriously, even by Communist fanatics, but the writer has been assured by thoughtful Communists that it is quite true.

Such is the power of years of incessant propaganda in a controlled press.

Shows Worry

An impartial observer might conclude, from the frenzied tone of the Soviet press, that the present ruling group was nervous about the safety of its position. But there is no evidence whatever that opposition groups have any important influence in Soviet Russia; the Stalin faction's position seems more secure than ever before. They have such a firm hold upon the state political machinery, such command of every means of force and public expression, that it is not conceivable that any effective political opposition could be organized.

Why, then, are the ruling powers making such a fuss about the alleged conspiracy? Why has a new "heresy hunt" been organized to humble further those who have ever, at any time since the revolution, voiced the mildest criticism of the present ruling group? One is forced to conclude that the present rulers are moved by a vindictiveness which makes them unwilling to show the slightest leniency toward their former political opponents, which determines them to make such men and women permanent outcasts in the Soviet social order. The authorities find it easier to forgive former aristocrats, former "kulaks," than former members of the Communist opposition groups.

Death For Knowledge

Giordano Bruno (1550-1600) famous Italian philosopher and scientist, committed the crime of inferring that the world is infinite and immeasurable and that our Earth was merely one of numerous planets and heavenly bodies. For this bold assertion, which was centuries ahead of his time, he was persecuted and hounded through most of the countries of Europe. He was finally arrested in Venice and transported to Rome where he was imprisoned for seven years. If he had been willing to recant his convictions, his death might have been averted. Because he refused to do so, he was burned at the stake and his ashes scattered to the winds. In 1889 a monument was erected to the martyr on the spot where he was burned centuries before.

MEXICAN DANCER HERE

Miss Xenia Zarina, Mexico's foremost exponent of classical dancing arrived in Japan on the Hiye Maru on October 20, as a special envoy sent by the Mexican government. Miss Zarina who was born in Belgium, has spent most of her life in the United States and it was there that she studied dancing under the finest masters.

Miss Zarina has no definite plans as to the length of her sojourn in Japan, but intends to stay at least a year, during which time she will study Japanese dancing and music, and will perhaps give recitals. She is at present staying at the Imperial Hotel.

CHILDREN'S INTERNATIONAL DAY

The Tokyo YWCA will hold its annual celebration of Children's International Day from 2 to 4 p.m. Saturday. A Japanese Festival Calendar Party is being held for children of all nationalities in Tokyo. The whole of the Y.W.C.A. will be transformed into scenes typifying well known Japanese festivals for each month of the year. The children will be taken from a room depicting January with games of battledore and shuttlecock to February where they will help drive the devils away by shooting beans at them. They will go through every month of the year all coming together in the month of December in the auditorium. The festival of the Milky Way in July will be celebrated in a big way using the swimming pool.

There will be a short program in the auditorium where a welcome speech will be given by Master Masafuku Tada representing the YWCA and a response by Miss Mary Elizabeth Horn. Later a Mickey Mouse cartoon will be shown and Santa Claus will appear and give out refreshments to the children.

Budge Stops Perry In Coast Net Final

LOS ANGELES, Sept. 27.—Donald Budge of Oakland, Calif., today defeated his famous rival, Fred Perry of England, 6—2, 4—6, 6—2, 6—3, to win the men's singles championship in the tenth annual Pacific southwest tennis tournament.

In a dramatic upset, Miss Alice Marble of Los Angeles, national women's singles champion, went down to defeat before the powerful stroking of Miss Gracyn Wheeler of Santa Monica, sixth ranking woman player in the country, 7—5, 2—6, 6—4, in the women's final.

Four thousand net enthusiasts packed the Los Angeles tennis club galleries to see Perry, the world's amateur singles champion, go down before Budge's brilliant attack. Budge won the Pacific southwest singles title last year. Perry took the laurels in 1932, 1933 and 1934.

Beaten Twice by Rival

Budge's vistory served in a minor measure to atone for his defeat by Perry twice in tournament play this year, first at Wimbledon and then in the finals of the United States championship at Forest Hills.

The Englishman, his game fading in the fourth set, virtually presented the last two games to Budge.

Budge found a weakness in Perry's backhand in the first set, and, breaking through the Briton's service three times, jumped into a lead after dropping the second and third games.

Perry, warming up his racquet, broke the American's service to go 4—3, repeated it to make it 5—4, and captured the second set with an impressive rally, 6—4.

Perry Throws a Point

Decisions by line judges irked both players in the third set. With the count 4—2 for Budge, Perry lobbed the ball across the net to give Budge the game after one disputable decision. Perry offered little opposition in the next game.

Perry started off the fourth set by taking the first game but Budge captured the next two at love. Perry evened it at two-all, then dropped the next three. Budge's terrific service brought him the eighth and deciding game. He served an ace for the final point.

Battle Of Argonne Began 18 Years Ago

47-Day Offensive, Employing 22 American Divisions, Started At Dawn On Sept. 26

WASHINGTON, Sept. 26.—Eighteen years ago today at dawn the American First Army started its pivotal attack which smashed the Hindenburg line on the western front and forced the imperial German command to sue for armistice.

But the forty-seven days of the Meuse-Argonne offensive, in the opinion of American military strategists, did more than clinch a victory for the allied cause in the war, says the New York Times.

They contend that it served also to justify General John J. Pershing's long and sometimes acrimonious struggle with British and French commands to preserve the identity of the American Army as an independent unit.

David Lloyd George, Great Britain's wartime Premier, recently published in his memoirs a severe criticism of the American Expeditionary Force's commander for his stubborn fight to keep his divisions intact instead of allowing them to be incorporated in the allied armies.

American observers said that no better answer could be given to that criticism than the result of the Meuse-Argonne offensive.

22 Divisions in the Assault

Other American Army units had participated effectively in earlier World War engagements as independent forces under their own officers. But never before had such vast numbers of American troops moved into action in a single drive.

As mobilized for the assault, the American First Army under the direct command of General Pershing consisted of twenty-two divisions, the total strength of which rose as high as 750,000 men at times. It was assisted by six French divisions, numbering about 135,000 troops.

This force flung forty-six German divisions, numbering more than 500,000 men, back to the Meuse River through some twenty miles of strongly fortified territory along a twenty-five mile front. The engagement lasted from Sept. 26 to Nov. 11, 1918, when hostilities ended with the Germans retreating in disorder.

American casualties for this battle alone totaled 122,000 killed and wounded, contrasted with 100,000 estimated German casualties and 26,000 German prisoners captured.

Allied Demands Recalled

Had the allied generals used American troops merely as replacements in their decimated divisions, American officers say that the Meuse-Argonne result might have been different.

General Pershing, in persistently refusing their demands, had contended that such an arrangement not only would offend the American public but that American soldiers could not be expected to fight as efficiently under a foreign flag and under foreign officers as under their own.

Yet official reports relate that he was harried on that subject by allied military leaders and statesmen almost continuously from the time he assumed command of the American forces in France until a short time before the Armistice.

General James G. Harbord, Pershing's first chief of staff in France and later chief of the army's Service of Supply, records that "if given in terms of the demands it made on the time of General Pershing and the number of various and devious angles from which approach was made, a reader fifty years hence might well conclude that this struggle between allies was more important than much of the fighting that went on."

Schools To Give Body A Place Equal To Mind's

all fit students in all schools. This proved invaluable in later years, but in 1917 overenthusiastic officials interpreted it to mean that all children must remain an extra hour after school each day. Protest swept the city, from teachers as well as students, and the whole program faced discredit.

New York had not yet become aware that health education and body training belonged in the curriculum. When this attitude was later adopted the provisions of the Welsh act became a great medium for good. Even in the high schools regular periods devoted to athletics during school hours were included.

Italy Sees League Not Wanting Her

Holds It Has Gone Out Of Its Way In Ethiopian Affair To Be Deliberately Hostile

By ARNALDO CORTESI

ROME, Sept. 25.—The League of Nations never has been popular in Italy, but now, since its decision not to exclude the Ethiopian delegation from the Assembly, nobody here has a single good word to say for it. "Those buffoons in Geneva," is the mildest title used when referring to it.

People here feel that the League has gone out of its way to be deliberately hostile and to make Italy understand clearly that she is not wanted in Geneva, and that is not surprising under the circumstances that Italy's resignation, which has so often been threatened, should again be mentioned as a possibility in the immediate future, it was reported to the N. Y. Times.

Resentment is the greater because the general opinion is that the conditions set by the Italian Government for its return to full collaboration with the League are very moderate.

Italy has not asked for explicit recognition of her Ethiopian conquest, for she realizes that it is rather much to expect at the present moment, but has limited herself to asking the League to take cognizance of the de facto situation in East Africa and to refuse admittance to the representatives of a government that, despite anything the Negus may say, is for all intents and purposes non-existent, in the Italian view.

Held Fair to League

This is a request, it is thought here, that the League could have satisfied without any loss of dignity or prestige if it was really anxious to obtain Italy's return to the fold.

As a matter of fact, the League's stand came as a considerable surprise to people here, since it was generally believed that the whole question of barring Ethiopia from further participation in the League's work had been settled during the visit of Joseph A. C. Avenol, the League's Secretary General, to Rome. So sure was the Italian Government that there would be no difficulty in this respect that it kept its delegation in readiness to leave for Geneva at a moment's notice. The revolt of the smaller powers, headed by Russia, was apparently a thing nobody had foressen and prepared for.

It is, in any case, regarded as a significant commentary on Italy's standing in the League that virtually all the governments followed the great powers' lead when it was a matter of applying sanctions against Italy, but that they repudiate the leadership of the great powers now that it is a matter of taking the steps necessary to bring Italy back to full collaboration with the League.

The general opinion here is that Premier Benito Mussolini has shown a degree of patience and long sufferance in his dealings with the League that nobody expected in a man of his temperament, especially at a moment when he was flushed with victory and more than ever confident of his power.

At the height of the sanctionist episode he had a very good reason for not abandoning Geneva, namely that he knew such a step would have gravely displeased France, and he was very hopeful of France's ability and willingness to help him.

This reason no longer holds good today and the majority of Italians are, therefore, at a loss to explain why Italy has remained a League member as long as she has.

Italy's quarrel with the League is of long standing and dates back long before the Italo-Ethiopian conflict. It will be remembered that some years ago the Fascist Grand Council decided that Italy should withdraw from Geneva unless the League covenant were immediately reformed.

Italy felt at that time that the small countries had too much power in the League and wished to alter the covenant in such a way as to permit the bigger countries to exercise more effective leadership. Last year's events served to confirm Italy in this opinion and Italy is, therefore, still more profoundly convinced that the League must either submit to reform or die.

Whether Italy remains in the League long enough to participate in this reform of the covenant is a question that will probably be decided in the next few days. It would be hazardous to venture a forecast, since the decision rests with Mussolini alone. If precedents mean anything, however, the probability is that Italy will not resign.

Yugo-Slav Status Among Nations In The Balkans

new orientation, and the Duke of Kent's marriage to the Regent's sister-in-law has been a further bond between the two countries. Finally, the King's visit to Dalmatia has added wonderfully to British popularity.

Another feature of Yugoslavia today is the large and rapid increase of trade with Germany. This recent trend is attributable, not only to Dr. Schacht's visit and his well-thought-out policy of economic penetration, but is due to the force of circumstances; for countries like Germany, which have clearing arrangements with the Balkan countries, have automatically to be favored.

Germany, of course, was always a good customer of Yugoslavia, but policy made her a better one. Two years ago she was taking 15.4 per cent. of all Yugoslav exports, but by the first half of 1936 this figure had risen to 25.44 per cent. This was due in part to the fact that under these barter arrangements Germany was not required to make payments in foreign currencies, and in part to the League's sanctions, which reduced Italy's share of Yugoslav trade from 20.5 per cent. in the first half of 1935 to less than 2 per cent. in the first half of 1936.

Frozen Assets in Berlin

When sanctions were imposed and Yugoslavia loyally gave up her prosperous trade with Italy, Great Britain came to her aid by increasing quotas for certain Yugoslav foodstuffs, but sixty per cent. of Yugoslavia's sanctions losses were made good by the increased trade with Germany. The consequence was a great increase in Yugoslavia's frozen assets in Berlin. In addition there were large frozen assets with Italy and Greece.

Altogether these frozen assets amounted to 700 million dinars, or £3,200,000.

"We could not afford to lose these blocked accounts," a leading Cabinet minister said to me. "We had to liquidate them by buying more in the countries where these assets had accumulated and, as a result we had, with great regret, to introduce a system of import licences for those countries with which we have an adverse trade balance, and where we have to pay in gold or foreign currencies. In the case of Great Britain this could be remedied if she would buy more wood from us instead of from Norway, or if she purchrased Yugoslav maize, poultry and bacon. Then we could increase the British quota."

This argument, of course, does not take account of British obligations to old clients like the Argentine, Denmark and Norway.

All these circumstances have loaded the scales in favor of Germany. To free her frozen assets Yugoslavia is simply obliged to buy more German goods.

Germany Building Strong Navy For Protection

The life is strenuous and the living simple, and to most of the candidates their profession is also their hobby. Considerable portions of their leisure hours are devoted to study. Specialist courses in gunnery, torpedo, signals, wireless, engineering, and so forth follow the period of said training, and it is from the ranks of the petty officers that are eventually selected the "Feldwebels," which correspond more or less to the warrant officers of the British Navy, and have the same privileges.

Plain Living

I saw enough of the training to realize that the work of reshaping the German Navy is being carried on with the usual German thoroughness and attention to detail. Officers and men are keen, smart, very efficient, and friendly, while all traces of the old Prussianism have vanished and there is real comradeship between the rank and file and their superiors. Moreover, having lived for a time in the homes of German naval officers, I am aware that they are considerably harder worked than their British comrades, and that their general standard of living is far simpler. Where a British officer may own a small car, the German still uses a bicycle. Meals are plain, and it is no rare thing for officers to eat the same food as their men.

Spending most of their time in uniform, the Service is their all-in-all, and they have few recreations outside it. Country walking, or "hiking," is largely indulged in, as is also swimming. Games are not a fetish. If played, they are regarded more as a pleasant means of keeping fit than with any desire to excel. Except on festive occasions, officers rarely visit restaurants, while one seldom sees them in the few cinemas. The excellent officers' clubs provided by the Admiralty at Kiel and elsewhere afford meeting places and means of entertainment.

But their outlook is by no means narrow. Most of them read widely and have a good knowledge of foreign affairs, particularly British affairs. English books and newspapers are in evidence in naval homes in Kiel, Berlin, and elsewhere. Moreover, there is a genuine admiration for Britain and the British Navy, and a very earnest desire for friendship and cooperation. Nothing could have been kinder than the welcome given to H. M. S. Neptune during her recent visit to Kiel, or to myself.

Soviet Weeds Out Factory Officials

Lagging Output Of Goods For Consumers Results In An Executive Shake-Up

Many factory managers have been dismissed and others warned they must improve their work or lose their jobs, in an attack by I. E. Lubinoff, Commissar for Light Industry of the Soviet Union, on the lagging output and bad quality of consumers' goods. The commissar told a conference of executives that conditions in numerous plants were so bad he could not wait for improvement and that the inadequate managers must be immediately replaced, says a recent dispatch to the New York Times from Moscow, which follows:

Although light industry production fulfilled the schedule in the first half of this year—a schedule, however, that was far below the people's wants—there has been a serious slump in the third quarter owing to a waning of the early enthusiasm in the Stakhanoff movement and disorganization as a result of the vacation period.

Textile Output Lagging

Mr. Lubinoff found many factories letting most of the working force go on vacations simultaneously. In many cases where vacations were not granted when the workers wanted them they simply played truant. As a result the quarter's production of cotton textiles was 49,000,000 meters behind flax textiles 27,000,000 meters behind and socks and stockings 800,000 pairs behind.

Simultaneously the Commissar for Internal Trade, S. Y. Veitzer, has ordered that all goods below a certain standard of quality be removed from stores and warehouses and returned to the factories. A Moscow plant making bentwood chairs has been closed down altogether because when distributing organizations complained of the bad quality the manager said:

"If you don't like our chairs don't take them."

Soviet officials point out that the Soviet Union now has excellent mechanical equipment and enough raw materials, so that there is no excuse for bad production. Difficulties are attributed to the fact that many factory managers are still paying no heed to the demands of consumers, who are no longer content with the wretched quality of goods they formerly accepted.

Soviet spokesmen stress the consumers' developing desire for better quality goods as a sign both of the attainment of a higher cultural level and higher purchasing power. Thus it is officially reported today that industrial production rose 33.8 per cent in the first half of this year and the total industrial wages rose 32.7 per cent.

The total wage fund allotted for industry this year was announced as 7,000,000,000 rubles over last year's fund. The collective farms' money income is scheduled to total 11,900,000,000 rubles this year, as compared with 9,400,000,000 last year.

Some Prices Raised

Food prices are maintaining about the same level as last Winter, but the prices of many other consumers' goods have been arbitrarily raised 20 to 50 per cent in the chief cities, although they have not been raised in country districts. It is learned this is intended to divert a larger share of available goods to the country, which previously fared badly in comparison with the cities. Another object is to check speculation.

Speculators have been buying up quantities of goods and retailing them at fancy profits. The roundup and imprisonment of such persons is going on constantly. One man who had two women assistants was sentenced recently to ten years' imprisonment.

He used to strut about big stores in a military uniform informing all and sundry that he was an "inspector" hunting speculator.

out of business," he held. "The power of personality is recognized as strongly as it ever was. When the radio came they told us our days were numbered, but we are still going strong. The radio has increased the number who are interested in our work. We are much less provincial than we used to be."

But Mr. Ely admitted that everything was not too well, reports the N.Y. Herald Tribune.

"If you ask what is the greatest evil in America today I think everyone would agree on lawlessness," he said. "It is certainly more apparent, and now you have crime going into business and being a big business. Yes, we may be slow in waking up, but under our system it never becomes impossible to improve the social order."

Mr. Ely said it was "all bosh to fear the Reds." "It is perfect rubbish, this talk of the influence of communism. It does not seem to me to be increasing to any extent. There is nothing to fear from the so-called Reds."

each day eating hundreds of miles out of the distance of 22,000 miles—the average being slightly more than 1,000 miles a day—through Calcutta to Bankok in Siam, down to Penang in the Federated Malay States, and then a two-day flight up the eastern coast of Asia to Hongkong, thirteen days from New York. This is the Eastern terminus of Imperial Airways, and there a break must be made in the air line from Hongkong to Manila, although it will be established in a short time.

Manila Bay is two days by boat from the harbor of Hongkong, with its high peaks and busy hillsides. Thence, from the town of Cavite, where Dewey riddled the Spanish fleet nearly forty years ago, the Pan American flying boats take off for America on a journey that consumes five days. (It would be two weeks by boat.)

For comfort, and even luxury, the big four-motored Pacific Clipper ships, with their crews of five or six men, are not equaled in the world. These are planes on which one can walk about as in a Pullman. They make the hops to Guam, Wake Island, Midway Island and Honolulu with the exactness of express trains. At each of these stops the traveller spends the night in a hotel, even on the tiny islands of the Pacific where men have never lived before except for brief intervals.

Then, San Francisco

The journey from Honolulu to San Francisco, a distance of 2,400 miles, consumes the best part of a day and night. At night the passengers sleep in berths as they would in a railroad train. The berths are somewhat larger than those on trains.

When the Pan American plane swoops down on San Francisco Bay at Oakland, the passengers will transfer to a United Air Lines plane which will make the journey to Newark in less than twenty hours. This craft is a sleeper plane also.

This is merely the beginning of world touring by air. For the first time it is possible to make such a trip, with only two interruptions. The possibilities for the future are great, for no swift means of travel has ever been inaugurated which did not eventually attract many of those who like to go places in a hurry.

Power Men Hear F.D.'s Plan For Service Pools

and a half. Although many questions of general principle were brought up, the practical discussions were confined to the situation in the Southeastern States, where the Commonwealth and Southern has found itself in potentially direct competition with the power distributed by the Tennessee Valley Authority.

Since January, 1934, the TVA and the private utility have had a "stand-off agreement" which has eliminated useless duplication of transmission facilities, but this plan will expire on Nov. 3.

In addition to Mr. Roosevelt, Mr. Willkie and Mr. McNinch, those who attended the meeting were Preston S. Arkwright, president of the Georgia Power Company; Samuel Ferguson, chairman of the board of the Hartford Electric Light Company; Owen D. Young, chairman of the board of the General Electric Company; T. W. Lamont of J. P. Morgan & Co.; Arthur E. Morgan, chairman, and David Lilienthal of the TVA; Basil Manly, vice chairman of the Federal Power Commission; Frederic A. Delano, vice chairman of the National Resources Committee, Morris L. Cooke, rural electrification administrator; Lewis Brandeis Wehle, New York attorney, and Alexander Sachs, research director of the Lehman Corporation.

Brandeis Kin Aids Roosevelt

Mr. Wehle and Mr. Sachs were advisers to Mr. Roosevelt in the days when he was attempting to work out a power policy for the State of New York, particularly in relation to the proposed St. Lawrence River development. Mr. Wehle is a nephew of Associate Justice Louis D. Brandeis of the Supreme Court.

Despite the apparent limitation of the discussion to the area which could eventually be served by the TVA, there was no doubt in the minds of the conferees that any policy which might be worked out to govern future relations between the TVA and the operating companies making up the Commonwealth and Southern system might easily be the forerunner of similar arrangements in other parts of the country where the same question will become acute in the near future.

The Federal Government is constructing, or has completed, power projects at Boulder Dam, Grand Coulee, Bonneville, and lesser sites. Ultimately, these projects, together with the dams of the TVA, will have a total capacity of 3,150,000 kilowatts, something like 10 or 12 per cent of the country's total generating capacity.

The problem of adjusting this supply of electricity to the public needs, with the least possible dislocation of existing facilities and investments, has actively occupied President Roosevelt's attention for some time. In announcing, on Sept. 19, that invitations had been issued for the meeting, the President said that interdepartmental discussion had been going on for some months.

It is understood that spokesmen for the President outlined several points as a guide to what is likely to be the administration power policy. These included the following:

1. In a public business like the generation and distribution of electricity, as distinguished from a purely private commercial venture, the primary consideration must be the widest and best possible service, with profit justifiably only to the degree reasonably necessary to insure adequate capital, competent management and progressive development.

2. The Federal Government must find ways to encourage greater and more diversified use of electric power at the lowest possible cost that will attract adequate capital and service.

3. The people of any properly delimited power distribution area should have the right to determine whether they will supply themselves with electricity from privately or publicly owned sources.

4. In any agreement that might be worked out between governmental agencies and private companies should be included the principle that litigation would not be employed as a form of obstruction, delay and coercion.

5. The private power industry, in return for its acknowledged services as far as concerns prudent investment, has a right to ask for reasonable returns on the fair value of used and useful property, in the absence of major obsolesence such as the depopulation of a community or major technological changes.

6. Rates should be determined by boards satisfactory both to the government and to the private utilities, or by arbitration.

7. Officials of private companies, as trustees for their investors, should insist on a high degree of competence and impartiality in appraisals or administrative organization leading to a power pool.

8. The TVA should promulgate a definition of its power policy and program for the guidance of the private companies in its territory.

Government officials were frank to admit that the move for pooling of resources might fail, and they emphasized that the desire of the Federal Government at this time was in no manner to threaten or coerce the private companies, or to present to them an ultimatum to which they must agree. The points outlined above were advanced merely as a basis of discussion.

Antibody Isolated By Chinese Doctors

Peiping Scientists Separate Protein Substance That Confers Immunity

Isolation for the first time in pure form of the specific substances, known as antibodies, that provide immunity against specific diseases, is reported today in Science, official organ of the American Association for the Advancement of Science.

The antibodies are the mysteries substances produced in the bodies of men and animals as a means of protection against harmful agents, such as bacteria. They are used in medicine in the form of vaccines and serums, but their exact nature and the mechanism of their action are still among the mysteries confronting science. Nor has it been possible until now to obtain the immunity-producing antibodies in pure form, reports the New York Times.

The report, which presents a significant advance not only in the light it sheds on the nature of immunity but also in the practical possibilities it offers for the treatment of many serious bacterial diseases, such as pneumonia, is presented by Drs. Bacon F. Chow and Hsien Wu of Peiping Union Medical College, Peiping, China.

Power of Pure Form Greater

The Chinese scientists report having recovered in pure form a protein substance from the serum used in the treatment of Type I pneumonia. This protein substance they found, according to their tests, to be the pure form of the antibody that renders animals immune against Type I pneumonia. In its pure form, they report, the antibody's protective power is increased fifteen to twenty times.

"We have made essentially the same observations," the report says, "with the precipitate obtained from Type I pneumococcus (pneumonia germ) antisera of horse and rabbit and with Type III pneumococcus antiserum of rabbit. We have found it also possible to recover the antibodies from the Type I pneumococcus agglutinate by essentially the same method used for the precipitate.

"The method for the isolation of pure antibody thus appears to have a general application.

Further Study Required

"The isolation of immunologically pure antibody is theoretically and practically significant. It has been a debatable question whether antibody is itself a protein or something else carried by the protein. Our present findings leave little doubt that the antibody itself is a protein.

"The mechanism of immunological reactions is not yet clear. Now that pure antibody is available, we can advantageously restudy the mechanism of immune reactions, especially the precipitin reaction.

Germany Rejects Devaluation Now

principal world countries is declared to be an "immoral" act in which Germany refuses to participate. Contrary to the joint declaration by the United States, France and Britain, Germany, it was said, sees no step toward stabilization in the new devaluation wave but rather the opposite, especially since the devalued currencies remain unstable, having neither a fixed gold parity nor a fixed relation among one another.

Even the dollar, it was declared, could be devalued another 10 per cent over night if President Roosevelt found this advisable for election or any other reasons.

Germany therefore sees no point in adding another unstable currency to the rest by devaluing the mark at this time, it was stated.

On the other hand, it appears that Germany will be willing to join the "immoral" crew if her wishes respecting debts, colonies and credits are met.

Sarcasm on Colonies

An inquisitive reporter who asked point-blank when Germany expected to get her colonies back received the sarcastic reply, "Within fourteen days!"

As regards debts, Germany expects either outright cancellation or reduction of both capital and interest, plus a complete moratorium for several years, during which interest would be added to capital.

Unless these problems are solved, it was emphasized, Germany cannot abolish her foreign exchange control, which would make devaluation valueless.

A more substantial reason why Germany can never abolish this control was not mentioned, namely, the desire of large amounts of capital, especially Jewish capital, to leave the country.

There was no mention, either, of what compensations Germany would or could give if her debts were canceled and her colonies restored, except her willingness to join the free economic system envisaged in the three-power declaration. In the interests of such a system, it was asserted, she would even be willing to drop Hitler's new four-year plan, "which we do not want but which was forced on us and which we would give up as soon as the free exchange of goods is restored."

WOMEN'S CLUB RECEPTION

The annual reception of the Tokyo Women's Club was held Monday at the home of the president, Mrs. Charles Iglehart, in the Aoyama Gakuin Compound. Mrs. Iglehart and Mrs. E. C. Hennigar, Vice-President of the Club, received the guests. Tea and coffee were served in the dining room and on the porch. Mrs. G. N. Coe supervised the tea arrangements, assisted by members of the executive committee. There were about 200 women present. Next week's meeting will be at 3 p.m. at the American Club. The lecture will be given by Mr. Jules Charbneau who has the largest collection of the world's smallest objects. The lecture was arranged by Mrs. T. D. Walser, chairman of the extension committee.

ASIATIC SOCIETY MEETING

A general meeting of the Asiatic Society of Japan will be held at the German Club at 4:30 p.m. Wednesday, October 28. Professor H. W. V. Temperley, F. B. A. University Professor of Modern History at Cambridge, Joint Editor of British Documents on the Origins of the War, President of the International Historical Congress, will speak on "The Reform Movement in the Turkish Empire during the Nineteenth Century."

NIPPON CULTURAL FEDERATION MEETINGS

The Nippon Cultural Federation held its regular meeting of flower arrangement at 10 a.m. today at its forum in the New Osaka Building, Uchisaiwai-cho, Kojimachi-ku.

The other regular meetings for Occidentals and Orientals will be as usual on Thursday, October 30. Mr. D. S. Deshpande will talk on "Fundamental Similarity between Shinto and Hindu Cultures" at the Thursday meeting and on Friday there will be a general discussion on "The Popular Front vs. the National Front." The time will be 5 p.m. on both days. Those interested are cordially invited to attend.

US-Born Japanese Invited To Party By Pacific Club

The Pacific Club, an organization of American-born Japanese, is sponsoring a Hallowe'en dinner-dance party at the Kaihin Hotel in Kamakura, beginning at 5 p.m. Sunday, November 1.

For the convenience of the party members in Tokyo and its vicinity a special train is arranged to leave Tokyo Station at 1 p.m. that day. In order to make this one of the biggest and jolliest events of the year the participation and cooperation of every member and friend of the Nichibei Young People's Federation is being asked by the organization.

After the arrival at Kamakura Station at 2:16 p.m., a visit will be made to the famous Hachiman shrine on foot, thence to the Daibutsu by special motor buses. The remainder of the afternoon may be spent in playing tennis, miniature golf, target shooting, billiards and other games, provided at the expense of the Kaihin Hotel.

A program is arranged to make the evening an eventful one. Everyone is cordially invited. From 5 p.m. there will be a dinner dance for which the Pacific Orchestra will play, and during the intermissions there will be games and musical numbers.

The affair will break up shortly before 9:45 p.m. when buses will leave for Kamakura Station. Return to Tokyo will be in a special car, arriving at 11:13 p.m. No school uniform will be allowed.

Party tickets, which include transportation fare both ways, are 3:50 per person. Please send in reservations by October 29 to Miss E. T. Uwi, corresponding secretary, c/o Kashiwa-kai, 3 Tozaki-cho, Koishikawa-ku, or to Miss H. J. Itai at the Japan-America Society, Imperial Hotel.

Army Strength Rises As Cuba Raps Congress

the army, under Colonel Fulgencio Batista, is broadening its influence over civil affairs.

While many Cubans view with disfavor the army's interference in the purely civil functions of education, health and labor, they are disgusted with the civil government, and for the first time since the September 4, 1933, sergeants' coup, which placed Batista at the head of the army, public opinion is strongly favorable to the military establishment, which is looked on as the only efficient and well-disciplined branch of government.

Political observers believe that, should Congress nad the civil government fail to offset public resentment, a showdown between the civil and military powers may be precipitated.

League Apathetic To Peace Appeal

Only 104 Of 240 Assembly Seats Filled At Session; World Delegation Asked

By CLARENCE K. STREIT

GENEVA, Oct. 1.—Public opinion as represented by the International Peace Campaign asked a hearing by the League of Nations Assembly and got a grudgingly-extended "unofficial" Assembly meeting today to receive its delegation.

The fact that the Assembly delegates were told that they were under no obligation to come and that they would have to listen to twelve speeches made the meeting serve mainly as a measure of how serious was their interest in peace.

It also served as a measure of the importance they attached to public opinion, since there is no doubt today's delegation represented the world's most important organized body of international opinion on peace. But the response was meager.

Viscount Cecil of Chelwood, one of the League Covenant's authors, presided over the peace delegation. The speakers included other men better known than most of the Assembly delelgates. There were Rene Fenck, one of the most famous French war aces; General Cheng, former commander of the Chinese Nineteenth Route Army, and Leon Jouhaux, French trade union head and outstanding European labor leader.

104 of 240 Seats Filled

There are 240 seats for delegates on the floor of the Assembly, but only 104 of them were filled, although all committee work had been adjourned to permit attendance at the session. The absentees included Foreign Secretary Anthony Eden and the whole British delegation and the Spanish and Ethiopian delegations. With such notable exceptions as Argentina, Chile and Mexico, most of the Latin-American delegates stayed away. Colonel Josef Beck, Polish Foreign Minister, sent one secretary, it was reported to the N. Y. Times.

The only important delegates to come were Foreign Minister Yvon Delbos of France, Foreign Commissar Maxim Litvinoff of Russia, Prime Minister W. L. Mackenzie King of Canada and Dr. V. K. Wellington Koo of China, each with his full delegation. All the British dominions except Australia attended, and the Scandinavians, Dutch, Swiss and Yugoslavs were strongly represented. One Belgian was present.

The public bonches of the Assembly were two-thirds empty. Where there are usually a dozen photographers there was one. There were few in the press gallery, although they included the representatives of most of the important news agencies and newspapers.

Lord Cecil told this audience that his delegation had been sent to advocate peace to the League by the Brussels peace conference last month. He laid before it that conference's program for peace, which calls for restoring respect for treaties, disarmament, collective security and taking the profits out of war.

The Brussels conference, he said, had consisted of 4,000 delegates from forty countries, including "almost all the European countries except Germany and Italy and also America, Asia, Africa and Australia."

The Groups Represented

They included organizations of veterans, trade unions, cooperative societies, women's organizations—represented today by Miss Mary Dingman of the United States—religious bodies, the first World's Youth Congress, and so forth, representing "many millions," as, Lord Cecil commented, the British peace ballot had shown.

After mentioning that ballot, Lord Cecil added, apparently with no ironical intent:

"Would it not be a great help to those who speak here for various countries to know that they have behind them the express wishes of their peoples?

"Often it has been said that public opinion is the lifeblood of the League and that is true. Without it nothing can be done; with it everything is possible. If that opinion can be educated, organized and made articulate shall not we tremendously strengthen the League's work for peace? We at least believe it to be so."

Mr. Fonck, looking very young for his war record, stressed the disaster threatening mankind from the air and in an eloquent appeal said:

"Veterans and comrade aviators, gather around and get behind the League. If we used for its peaceful work only one-tenth the energy we used for destruction, we would give an irresistible impulse to the pacific movement that must save Europe.

Urges Them Forward for Peace

"The peoples are looking to us. They await the talisman that willl break the chains of fear, the haunting fear of massacre. Comrades and aviators of every land, forward for the honor and peace of the world!"

The official Assembly meeting this morning was devoted to speeches by the delegates of Haiti, the Dominican Republic, Colombia, Argentina and Portugal, all in applause of Foreign Minister Carlos Saavedra Lamas of Argentina for his work in ending the Chaco war and his peace ideas.

Mr. Maynard of Haiti seemed to let another cat out of the bag when he said, apropos of seating the Ethiopian delegation:

"We shall make no attempt to conceal the suprise and relief felt by our delegation—which had come to the Assembly thinking it might have to play an ungrateful part in order to promote an agreement between the great powers, in whose hands lies the tragic alternative of peace or war—when it learned that it was proposed that the delegates should vote according to their sentiments."

British Tories Bar Mandate Cessions

Overrule Baldwin And Declare Question 'Not Discussible' With Foreign Countries

The Baldwin Cabinet's fears of doing or saying anything to antagonize Adolf Hitler were flatly disregarded on October 1 by the Conservative party conference, which demanded that the government declare that the cession of any British mandated territory is an "undiscussible question."

After the conference had thus expressed itself with practical unanimity the delegates asked that a message be sent to the Prime Minister saying, "What we have we hold."

Sr Samuel Hoare, First Lord of the Admiralty, who was the government's spokesman at the opening session, tried in vain to persuade the conference not to pass its mandates resolution, but he received full approval for his speech on the progress of British rearmament, according to the New York Times.

Urged Point Before

In March, 1935, Sir John Simon, then Foreign Secretary, told Chancellor Hitler in Berlin that the "cession of British mandates is not a discussible question." On several occasions this year Conservative members of the House of Commons have tried to get the government to say that Sir John's assertion still represented its "unaltered attitude," but neither Prime Minister Baldwin nor Anthony Eden, Foreign Secretary, would commit himself because of the government's determination not needlessly to antagonize Berlin.

The Prime Minister has restricted himself to declaring that the question of mandates has not been considered, that the government had no intention of raising it and that under no circumstances would anything ever be done about it without consultation with Parliament.

Mr. Eden gave Parliament the same assurance but added a warning that nothing should be said to increase the already serious difficulties among nations.

Sir Samuel repeated that warning at the conference today and urged the delegates to amend their "undiscussible" resolution to make it accord with the cautious government attitude. The delegates vociferously refused to be cautious.

Then Sir Samuel tried a little defiance himself and assured the conference its resolution would not cause the government to change its policy.

The conference further showed its disregard for Mr. Baldwin's feelings by unanimously adopting a resolution demanding reform of the House of Lords by the present government to forestall abolishing peers altogether when the next Socialist government takes office.

This reform, which means making the upper house impregnable, has been demanded by the extreme Right Conservatives ever since Mr. Baldwin became the leader of the party, but he has declined each year to do anything about it. It was clear from today's actions that reactionary members of the party expect to get rid of Mr. Baldwin immediately after the coronation next May, if not sooner.

Mr. Baldwin himself was absent from the conference for the first time since he became the party leader. His annual address to the delegates will be made for him tomorrow night by Neville Chamberlain, Chancellor of the Exchequer, who is considered the most likely successor to the Prime Minister.

Baldwin Visits London

Mr. Baldwin came to 10 Downing Street tonight for the first time since Parliament adjourned at the end of July. He conferred with Mr. Chamberlain concerning the speech tomorrow. The Prime Minister will return to the country in the morning to continue his rest until Parliament meets at the end of this month.

Sir Samuel had better luck at the conference when speaking on behalf of the government on the conference resolution approving the British rearmament policy, although he had nothing new to disclose concerning the enlarged naval program and plans for increasing the air force and rehabilitating the army. This resolution approving preparedness was, of course, adopted unanimously.

After reviewing the major facts of the European armaments race and the successful efforts Britain is making to catch up with the procession in behalf of peace, Sir Samuel said in part:

"Much of our arms program is absolute, not relative. It is intended to safeguard the essentials of the British Commonwealth of Nations. The communications of our great oceanic empire must be secure, whatever may or may not happen in other countries of the world. The mother country and metropolis cannot be allowed to exist on sufferance.

"We can on no account agree to any disarmament proposals which would stereotype our relative weakness. If, as we all hope, in the future we can arrive at a general imitation of armaments, it must be on the assumption that our program has been completed.

"We have not reached the point when it is necessary to impose war conditions and endanger the returning prosperity of the country. We still believe the wisest course from a broad national standpoint is to avoid as long as we can a great economic upheaval of this kind, and we are not convinced that with the good-will of industry and labor we cannot carry through in a reasonable time our program upon existing industrial lines."

Dr. John Bull

Dr. Bull (1562-1628), organist of Hereford Cathedral, member of the Royal Chapel, Doctor of Music, and Professor of Music at Gresham College, is credited with being the composer of "God Save the King"; which he is reputed to have sung for King James I at the entertainment of the Merchants Taylors' Company on July 16, 1607. The composition is said to exist in manuscript by Dr. Bull's own hand, the manuscript being captioned "God Save the Kinge". For some reason Dr. Bull was eventually compelled to flee England and he died as organist of the Antwerp (Belgium) Cathedral.

To Enlarge Manchou Petroleum Company

Domei

HSINKING, Oct. 20—An Imperial ordinance was announced yesterday concerning the enlargement of the Manchoukuo Petroleum Company to meet the rapidly growing demands in the country.

In accordance with the revised regulations, the petroleum company will increase its present capital of 5,000,000 yuan to 10,000,000 yuan. The Government will take up 3,500,000 yuan of the increased sum, while the remaining 1,500,000 yuan will be consumed by private interests.

The new regulations also provide for several important changes in the structure and functions of the oil company.

Hsinking To Announce New Trade Regulations

Domei

HSINKING, Oct. 20—In order to encourage foreign trade in Manchoukuo the Government will announce in the middle of November a set of new regulations governing the establishment of bonded warehouses at important cities in the country, it was reliably learned here today.

The draft regulations which have just been completed were discussed today at the session of the State Council, it is further revealed. Final approval for the plan will be given by the Manchoukuo Privy Council on October 29.

The projected warehouses will be erected at Hsinking, Mukden and Harbin to facilitate the interests of foreign traders in the country.

Many of a Kind

Quadruplets are not often heard of, while uinpuplets are, of course, extremely rare.—Weekly paper.

Quinkittenlets, on the other hand, are fairly common.—Humorist.

The Talkative Sex

A married man buttonholed another and imparted some neighborhood news. "Don't let this go any further, George," he said.

"No, certainly not!" said the other. "But how did you happen to hear it?"

"Oh, from the wife, of course!" was the answer. "She's just like all women—can't keep a secret!"—Grit.

Takarazuka Theater Gives Good Program

The program at the Tokyo Takarazuka Theater is one of the best they have ever had. The first number on the program is Tayu Gasa. It is the story of a sweet potato seller and a princess and is remarkably well done. The semi-foreign music and the Japanese dancing go well together. "Funa Benkei" supplies the old Japanese element and Miss Yoshiko Muromachi is really splendid in the part of Benkei. Miss Otome Amatsu takes the part of the spirit of Tomomori and gives a very realistic performance. The first part of the story is a long dialogue between Minamoto Yoshitsune, taken by Miss Yachiyo Kusagano, and Benkei which is not very interesting for those who don't happen to understand Japanese, but it is certainly worth waiting for the scene between the spirit of Tomomori and Benkei The spirit appears when Yoshitsune and Benkei are making a sea voyage west, and the sea becomes rough. In order to vanquish the spirit Benkei prays. The struggle between the spirit and Benkei's prayers is truly thrilling. Gradually the sea becomes calm and the spirit disappears.

The piece de resistance of the performance is the Grand Review, "La Romance" in 20 scenes. It is the story of the love of a musician, Charles for Virginie, and the troubles they encounter before they finally find each other again after a long separation. The dancing and the scenery arrangement is better than I have ever seen on the Takarazuka stage. The part of Charles is taken by Miss Kuniko Ashihara, that of Virginie by Miss Hisami Fujihana, Leon, Charles' friend, by Miss Reiko Hatsune and Virginie's mother by Miss Tamayo Tsuranuki.

The performance is given by the Snow group, and next month starting November 5 the Flower group will give the same review, La Romance, but the other parts of the program will be changed. Miss Kuniko Ashihara will remain in the part of Charles and Miss Kaoru Tachibana and Miss Tokiko Miura, blues singers in the present show, will also remain in their parts next month.

Likes And Dislikes

The likes and dislikes of two such appealing motion picture actresses as Madge Evans appearing in Columbia Pictures forthcoming production "Pennies From Heaven," playing opposite Bing Crosby and Dolores Del Rio who will appear in the same company's "The Depths Below," with Richard Dix and Chester Morris proves an interesting parallel because they represent two distinct types; Madge Evans, the blonde; Dolores Del Rio, the brunette.

Madge Evans likes....autographs ....night clubs....to entertain....to sleep late....silk underwear....ice cream cones, especially chocolate ones....rain (walking in)....animals ....children....fan mail....premiers ....open cars....bath salts....Hollywood....to dine out....and bright colors. Miss Evans dislikes.... street cars....to travel alone....holidays....to carry umbrellas....modern architecture....personal appearances....to read before sleeping ....her pet peeve is being referred to as a child star in the movies.

Dolores Del Rio likes....night clubs....to entertain....to sleep late ....silk underwear....animals.... children....fan mail (what Hollywood) star doesn't)....holidays.... premiers....bath salts....Hollywood ....modern architecture....personal appearances....to dine out ....to read before sleeping....bright colors. Miss Del Rio dislikes....autographs ....street cars....to travel alone.... rain....open cars....to carry umbrellas. She has a pet peeve too....her's is telephone conversations.

BAD MEN AND BABY IN DESERT FILM

"The three godfathers," based on Peter B. Kyne's wildely-read novel will be the feature attraction at the Imperial Theater this week.

The picture tells the story of three bad-men of the American desert—Bob, young and reckless adventurer; Doc, the elderly, educated "lunger;" and Gus, illiterate and happy-go-lucky—who descend upon New Jerusalem to rob the bank a few days before Christmas.

In their escape across the desert, the three men find a dying mother, an infant clutched in her arms. The untold sacrifices they make to save the babe's life and get it back safely to civilization provides the theme of the human story.

"The Three Godfathers" is described as a saga of the American Desert. Most of its scenes were shot beneath the blistering sun of the California desert. Other scenes revive the old desert towns as they used to be. An entire community was filmed for certain sequences of the picture. Other settings include a frontier church, dance hall and pioneer homes.

To prevent "The Three Godfathers" from becoming another "Western"—for it is not a "Western"—Producer Joseph Mankiewicz selected Richard Boleslawski as the director.

Formerly director of the Moscow Art Theater and with such notable pictures as Garbo's "Painted Veil," Charles Laughton's "Les Miserables," Lawrence Tibbets' "Metropolitan" and Wallace Beery's "O'Shaughnessy's Boy" to his credit—Boleslawski applied his same directorial skill to "The Three Godfathers."

In the principal roles are Chester Morris as young Bob; Lewis Stone as the philosophical Doc; and Walter Brennan remembered as the patch-eyed-roustabout in "Barbary Coast," as Gus.

Other stellar actors in the cast include Irene Hervey, Sidney Toler, Dorothy Tree, Roger Imhof, Willard Robertson and Robert Livingston.

Also the cast includes the unusual combination of four sevenmonths-old babies—two pairs of twnis—who alternate in the one baby role. They are little Jean and Judith Kirchner, and Jeanne and Joanne Kelly.

Expert Fashion Advice

"A business woman can be as glamorously dressed this Fall as a movie star if she selects her costumes with as much good judgment, thought and care," declares Ernst Dryden, one of Hollywood's best known style designers.

Now engaged in preparing Irene Dunne's wardrobe for her forthcoming Columbia picture, "Theodora Goes Wild," Dryden advises a business girl to first select a smart tailored suit that can be transformed into a two-occasion costume by a simple change of accessories. A colored blouse, a smart leather bolt, walking shoes, a sport hat and sturdy leather gloves describe this suit for general utility. Add a white satin or crepe blouse, a handsome rhimestone neck clip, suede gloves and shoes and a trick chapeau and this suit goes to informal dinner and the theater. Dryden urges the business woman to select two simple sheer wool frocks that are made distinctive and charming by the addition of smart accessories such as a multiple string of pearls, metal or paillette collars and cuffs, a wide, wide novelty belt and the like. The designer warns against cheap furs and suggest a plain tailored topcoat, to which you may add a fur neckpiece if Santa Claus hears your heart's deepest yearning. For formal wear Dryden suggests black, as black will forever play the leading role in smart fashion.

Italy Is Declared Anxious For Peace

Now A Satisfied Nation, She Is Unlikely To Link Herself With Still Unsatisfied Reich

ROME, Sept. 10.—Italy, with her expansionist policy realized through the Ethiopian conquest, is now bent on reconquering her place among the European nations. Economic as well as political motives dictate this policy.

Economically, Italy, despite repeated statements that she needs no one, realizes the advantages cordial reations with Europe would give her in the program of colonial development she is about to undertake.

Premier Benito Mussolini has always prided himself on being a practical statesman. Undoubtedly he apprehends the enormous disadvantages lying in a policy of isolation, which, as shown during the period of League sanctions, would continue to tax the country's already strained resources at a time when it needs them for exploitation of Ethiopia.

By remaining alone Italy would find it much more difficult to pursue a policy of economic penetration in Europe, which she needs to do, if not so much at present, certainly in the future, when the tangible results of Ethiopia's development make themselves felt. Furthermore, the markets she lost through sanctions also must be regained, and this can be more easily achieved if her relations with other European States are good.

Mussolini's Attitude

Politically, Mussolini has already spoken very clearly about his pacific aims. His statements, in the light of present circumstances, cannot be doubted and his reticence to encourage a bloc policy that would result in alignment of hostile groups of nations also can be easily understood, says the New York Times.

Despite repeated proofs of cordial support between Germany and Italy, Mussolini will never bind himself to Chancellor Adolf Hitler unless he is absolutely forced to do so. The reason is obvious. Italy believes she has a bright economic future, thanks to her Ethiopian conquest. She is now a satisfied nation, quite desirous of maintaining her present status. By forming an alliance with Germany she would be compelled to champion actively Hitler's expansionist program.

The only motive that could throw these two nations into each other's arms would be a Bolshevist threat. Italians, however, refuse to believe that France, which is eminently an agricultural nation of small landowners, would become a docile slave of Moscow. Hence Italy feels that there is a chance of concluding a general European pact, including France and Germany.

League Reform

A peace system already exists, of course, in the form of the League of Nations. But before it can be made to work effectively and before Germany can be induced to reenter it, in Italian opinion, it must be reformed in accordance with the new situation created by the Reich's increasing influence in Europe.

But Italy must get back to the League herself before she will be able to exert her political pressure and collaborate in solution of this problem. This explains Italy's conciliatory attitude and her wish not to create unnecessary obstacles to resumption of normal political relations with the rest of the world.

Sneak Thief Caught

A series of petty theffts, causing no end of embarrassment and mystery at a Holywood Studio, ended recently with the apprehension of the culprit when he was caught red-handed in this criminal act.

During the three weeks of filming on Bing Crosby's "Pennies From Heaven" at Columbia Studios with Madge Evans, Edith Fellows and others, a number of thefts have taken place on the set and the posting of a guard proved to no avail.

The mysterious disappearance of innumerable small objects continued despite the efforts of Director Norman McLeod and others to catch the thief.

Fountain pens, silver pencils and other personal possessions were reported lost daily and not until the thief was caught in the act of stealing a diamond ring from the dressing table of Madge Evans was any solution to the robberies apparent.

The thief proved to be a trained black crow being used in the "Haunted House Cafe" sequences and when trailed to his cache behind some scenery at the end of the large sound stage, all of the property reported lost during the last three weeks was recovered and restored to its owners.

London Economist Praises New Deal

24-Page Supplement To Financial Journal Analyzes Policies And Finds Widespread Gains

Whatever Wall Street may think of him President Roosevelt deserves to be re-elected, in the opinion of Sir Walter Layton's weekly, The Economist, the most important organ of financial opinion in Britain according to the London correspondent of the New York Times.

The Economist bases its belief not only on the record of the Roosevelt Administration, but on the program and philosophy of the present-day Republican party. To buttress its conclusions, it published recently a twenty-four-page supplement containing an encyclopedic survey of the New Deal, with all its faults and successes in the last three and half years.

"If the criterion be Utopian, the achievements of the New Deal appear to be small," The Economist admits. "Relief there has been, but little more than enough to keep the population fed, clothed and warmed. Recovery there has been, but only to a point still well below the pre-depression level. Reform there has been, but it is slight in comparison with the reformers' blue prints.

"The great problems of the country are hardly touched. Moreover, the great overriding problem of how America is to construct a socially responsible, socially regulated economy with her present Constitution has been shirked.

"A good case could undoubtedly be made for an opposition which, without hiding behind the letter of the Constitution, would accept the paramount necessity for a broad economic and social policy and set out to correct Roosevelt's mistakes. But the only way of voting Roosevelt out would be to vote the Republicans in and the Republicans have never shown any desire to be this sort of opposition.

"Under Hoover, their policy was one of non-intervention as long as that was possible. Under Landon, the Republicans have a policy distinguishable only in minor shades of emphasis from that of the Democrats. The Republicans in this campaign are paying Roosevelt the tribute of borrowing his polices while denouncing his philosophy.

"If the New Deal be compared not with absolute standards of Utopia but with the achievements of other governments, the former adverse judgment must be modified. If it be compared with either the performance or the promise of its rivals, it comes out well. If its achievements be compared with the situation which confronted it in March, 1933, it is a striking success.

"Roosevelt may have given the wrong answer to many of his problems, but he is at least the first President of modern America who has asked the right questions."

Canada Weighs Reopening Gate To Immigrants

period of five years on farms not owned by the settlers but the property of the county or other organization in England that established them. The organization founding these new settlements, on each of which 100 families would be established, would be the sole owner, not the British government. Through this means it is anticipated there would be adequate financing and proper supervision, while settlers unable to measure up to the standard would be sent back.

British to Give Guaranties

The British government would provide all financial guaranties. Canada, which already has provided railways, roads and schools, would not be obliged to contribute financially under the scheme.

Opposition to increased immigration was voiced at the convention by the Saskatchewan section of the United Farmers of Canada and M. J. Coldwell, Cooperative Commonwealth Federation member of Parliament, who said that in 1933 and 1934 Canada had sent many more Britons back to the United Kingdom than had immigrated to this country. He was opposed to any plan of immigration until such time as Canadian farmers had raised their standard of living and youth given a wider opportunity for success.

Views of Plan's Advocates

"If the pioneers had waited for a sunny day to come to Canada," retorted a prominent churchman, the Rev. Charles Endicott, "there would have been no Canada." Former Presbyterian Moderator W. G. Brown supported his contention that Canada needed more people. However, he did not favor an all-British policy. Immigrants from the Scandinavian countries and the Netherlands, he believed, were excellent settlers and more advanced in many respects than Britishers.

Pressure is being brought to bear on the Federal authorities and there is a strong expectation that on Premier Mackenzie King's return from Geneva and London, where he will have had an opportunity to discuss the problem from Britain's point of view, an announcement of definite assistance for settlement plans will be made.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

Hollywood Story

Here is one of those peculiarly "Hollywood" stories that few know.

Nearly a decade ago, David O. Selznick, now president and executive producer of Selznick International Pictures, producers of "Little Lord Fauntleroy" and "The Garden of Allah," was a young and ambitious assistant producer on the Paramount lot.

Even then he had shown a sure instinct for gauging the public's response to story—appeal—what Hollywood calls "showmanship"—plus the creative ability to bring ideas to vivid life on the screen by means of superlative story-telling, flawless casting and scrupulous perfection in production.

One day Opportunity knocked at the Selznick door.

It was an interim period when his superior was absent on a journey, having authority and decisions to the young assistant. A fledgling writer on the lot came to Selznick with an idea.

Arnold Rolthstein, the New York gambler, had just been murdered. The fledgling writer, Oliver H. P. Garrett, was fresh from reportorial triumphs on the staff of the then famous New York World.

"I would like," Garrett told his friend Selznick, "to do a story that will bring to the screen the drama of those shadowy, sinister figures of Broadway's night life, the big-shot gamblers who shoot craps for fortunes in Broadway's 'traveling dice game.' A story with a partially idealized Rothstein as its central character."

Selznick immediately perceived the dramatic possibilities of the idea and was enthusiastic about it. Together he and Garrett worked out every detail of the script, while with exacting thoroughness the youthful assistant set about the casting and the essential details of production. William Powell, still to achieve his greatest fame, was set for the lead.

The rest is Hollywood history, another typical Hollywood "success story." Garrett's story, produced under the personal supervision of Selznick, was released as "The Street of Chance." The picture ran up tremendous grosses and was seriously considered for the Academy award for the best original film story of the year.

Several important Hollywood destinies were favorably affected. Powell was established as a star of first magnitude. Kay Francis, cast as the wife of Powell, became a star in her own right. Garrett's place as a leading screen writer was firmly fixed.

Most important, Hollywood became definitely aware that a new genius of production had "arrived." "Street of Chance" was David O. Selznick's notice to the film world that his career was to be an important one.

Today the association that began back in the days when both Selznick and Garrett were earning their spurs has been happily renewed. One of Selznick's first political acts when he became president and executive producer of Selznick International was to place Garrett, now famous as a consistent writer of hit pictures, under exclusive contract.

Garrett has been assigned to work out an original story soon by Selznick International.

Soviet Russia's Modern Theater Movement Told

Odessa audience drank in its tepid sweetness as eagerly as any audience in New York or London or Paris.

In fact, there seemed to me everywhere, in the Russian theater, an increasing emphasis upon the sentimental and romantic aspects of life. Even in the contemporary plays, one finds the dramatists dealing with individual problem and emotional relationships to a degree that would have been frowned upon as counter-revolutionary not so many years ago. I think it is symptomatic of the general amelioration of the rigors of life which is so noticeable throughout the Soviet Union and is particularly evident in the theater audience itself. The contrast between 1932 (when I was last in Russia) and 1936 is very marked. The people are better and more tastefully dressed, especially the women, who now make a great parade of cosmetics and jewelry. During the intermissions the well-stocked buffets are crowded to the doors. Faces and bodies are more relaxed; the whole mood is gayer and brighter.

Beautiful City

In Kiev—a beautiful city—we were lucky enough to encounter the Moscow Art Theater (for some years now the Gorki Theater). We saw the company perform on two successive night. The first night we saw a contemporary play, "Platon Krechet," by Alexander Kornyechuk. Again the large theater was packed and the only seats we could get were in the last row. The play takes its name from its principal character, an eminent young surgeon, who has risen from obscurity. He is engaged to Lida, an engineer. Krechet is called upon to perform an emergency operation, but fails to save the patient's life. He is unaware that the patient is Lida's father. When she learns the truth she denounces Krechet as incompetent and breaks the engagement. Still dazed by this blow, he receives word that an important commissar has been injured in an automobile accident and that he must perform an operation at once. Krechet, his self-confidence completely destroyed, refuses. But his mother pleads with him and prevails upon him to attempt the operation. He rushes to the operating room, performs his task and the commissar's life is saved. A committee, representing the government, formally presents Krechet with a ticket good for a trip through Europe for himself and his wife. Lida, who is present at the ceremony, relents and consents to accompany him.

It is by no means a great play, although perhaps not quite as banal as my bald outline makes it appear. It is brightened and enlivened by several amusing character sketches—notably a pert little girl and an eccentric old professor—and by the splendid production and acting. There are many who regard Stanislavski and the Moscow Art Theater as completely outmoded, but to me they still represent the highest level that the contemporary art of the theater has reached anywhere. The scene in which a dozen people wait tensely—with scarcely a word spoken—while Krechet is performing the operation, off-stage, is a magnificent piece of artifice, climaxed by a breath-taking moment when Krechet stumbles out of the operating room, collapses and rolls down a flight of steps.

Despite much incidental discussion of Soviet problems, there is little of the revolutionary blood and iron in this piece. It touches most upon mother love and romantic love and there are actually long tender passages with violin accompaniment. Certainly, in its outlines, the plot fulfils all the requirements of Hollywood.

The next night we saw the Moscow Art Theater troupe again. Once more, a friendly management provided us with seats in the first row, after all other efforts had failed. This time the piece was called "Pikvikski Klub"—or, in plain English, "Pickwick Club"; a dramatization by N. Venkstern of "Pickwick Papers," by the late Charles Dickens. To those who say it cannot be done, I can only reply: "Go and see for yourselves." Myself, I have never spent a happier or more enchanted four hours in a theater. From the moment the curtain rose upon Mr Pickwick's lodgings in Mrs. Bardell's house, until it fell upon the scene of riotous festivity at Dingly Dell, I was in a state of complete surrender.

The stage designer had happily taken Cruikshank as his model so that anyone who had become acquainted with Pickwick in childhood, when the illustrations meant almost as much as the text, felt at once delightedly at home. And when, in the second scene, Squire Wardle's coach rolled upon the stage, drawn by two life-size wooden horses, with Joe, the Fat Boy, asleep upon the box, it was enough to make one weep for joy, says the N.Y. Herald Tribune.

Necessarily, the action was jerky and episodic. A long scene beneath Arabella's window and another in the debtors' prison could perhaps have been condensed, but these were merely relative quiet moments in a riotous evening. The Russians excel at low comedy and the acting was superb. V. V. Gribkov (whom I had seen the preceding night as the old professor in Platon Krechet) was all that one could ask as Mr. Pickwick and a young "dead-pan" actor, A. M. Kommissarov, made Mr. Winkle ludicrous beyond words. Young Bardell, Alfred Jingle, Esq., Old Lady Wardle and all the rest were thoroughly delightful. Tony Weller was unaccountably missing and I was a little disappointed in Sam (one of my favorite characters in all fiction). But the Ukrainian audience seemed to find him hilarious. I wish New York could see "Pikvikski Klub."

Good Acting

Good luck attended us in Kharkov, too, for there we found the Nemirovich-Danchenko troupe. (This is the company which visited America about ten years ago as the Musical Studio of the Moscow Art Theater.) We saw them perform "Tikhi Don," an opera based upon Sholokov's well-known novel, familiar to American readers as "And Quiet Flows the Don." As an opera it has not too much to commend it. The music is pleasantly melodic and quite singable but scarcely original or distinguished. But the story is good—the first two-thirds, at any rate. Here again, we have the focus upon a purely individual problem. It is a passionate love story; the tale of a young Cossack chief who, at the cost of disgrace and disinheritance, leaves his bride for the wife of another. The early scenes move with a swiftness and intensity that are more dramatic than operatic, due to the fact that the members of the company—trained in the Moscow Art Theater tradition—are fine actors as well as singers.

The love passages, although sung, have all the intensity which fine acting can give them. The ensemble scenes, of which there are many, have a variety and a plastic form which are indescribable. There is nothing comparable to it in our theater. To give one brief example: A scene is laid in a harvest field, crowded with peasants—Cossacks and their women. (Incidentally, the scene is given scope and dimension by a single huge windmill arm which projects from the wings.) The Cossack general appears and summons his men to war. During his long recitative the men and women say their farewells. It is a remarkable scene. No two women weep in the same way, no two men make the same fond gestures; each couple literally plays an individual scene, yet the whole is perfect in its balance and harmony. I am told that these productions are personally supervised by Nemirovich-Danchenko, now a man in his seventies.

I think that in their theater, as in other departments of their life, the Soviet citizens will continue to demand—and to get—more laughter, more gayety, more romance, more concern with the daily business of individual living. Meanwhile, the theater continues to flourish, as it does in no other country.

Britain Resorting To Mailed Fist In Palestin

Hussein, dated December 13, 1919, states the British, "without prejudicing the interests of their ally France, take under observation Hussein's claims and promise assistance to the Arabs and never to make a peace with the Turko-Germans in which the independence of the Arab nation is not recognized."

The seventh letter, Hussein to McMahon, dated January 1, 1916, contains Hussein's agreement to let drop for the duration of the war only the question of Libau (Lebanon) in his desire to avoid difficulties among the allies who are fighting for a common aim. Hussein admits not the slightest concession however which would give France a foothold in the disputed regions

The eighth letter, McMahon to Hussein, dated January 25, 1916, conveys Britain's appreciation of Hussein's conciliatoriness and declares that henceforth the Arabs and British are allies.

It was a year later, in 1917, after the Arabs had fought valiantly under Colonel T. E. Lawrence and other British leaders against the Turks, that Lord Balfour sponsored the Zionist declaration.

Balfour Gives Reassurance

After this, serious complications arose. The German Intelligence and the Turks whispered among the Arabs that they had been double-crossed. King Hussein was shown copies of the Balfour declaration and open revolt against the British flared among the Arabs. The Foreign Office got busy at once and there was an interchange of correspondence which terminated with an absolute and categoric assurance by Lord Balfour that Britain stood by her original promises to the Arabs, any subsequent declarations notwithstanding. The Turco-German charges which Hussein had received were branded as enemy intrigue and propaganda. In February, 1918, King Hussein received the following statements in a letter from Colonel Pabst, the British representative at Jeddah:

His Majesty's government, in accord with its allies, continues in its attitude of favor towards any movement having for its object the liberations of oppressed nations, and is determined to uphold the Arab Nation in its struggle to reconstruct an Arab empire where the law and the Cheri (Moslem legislation) will rule in place of Turkish injustice and where fictitious discord among Arabs, instigated by Turkish official authorities, will disappear.

His Majesty's government reiterates its previous promises concerning the liberation of the Arab nation.

After having pledged itself to this policy of liberation it is determined to continue honestly in that course with the resolution to prevent Arabs who are already liberated from falling back into the abyss of bondage and to aid those who are still under the yoke to obtain liberty.

That Great Britain will indefinitely continue to leave her pledges to the Arabs unsatisfied is hardly conceivable. A friendly native population in Arabia, Egypt, Mesopotamia and other parts of the Near and Middle East is too important. Her imperial air lines converge in that part of the world. The Mosul and other oil fields are indispensible for Empire naval communications. Germany is again reviving her "Berlin to Bagdad" dream and the "drang nach osten" has begun, through Hungary, Bulgaria, Rumania and perhaps into the Ukraine and Black Sea region, first.

If Italy becomes powerful in the Mediterranean (and with Somaliland, Ethiopia and Libya-Tripolitana she has a good start, even though she may not get a foothold in Spanish Morocco and the Balaeric Island), and Germany dominates the Balkans and eastern Europe, Britain is blocked—on land, sea and in the air.

England has gone a long way already in carrying through some of her promises to the Arabs. It is true that she sacrificed King Hussein, but his son, Abdullah, is King of Transjordania, a British mandate, which some day, like Irak, will become independent. A grandson of Hussein, Ghazi, the son of Feisul, rules at Bagdad. The French will soon turn their Syrian mandate into an autonomous state. Palestine alone is cherished by London as a crown colony.

MEIJISETSU CELEBRATIONS

On the occasion of the Meijisetsu on November 3 the memorial day for the Emperor Meiji, several special functions will be held in Tokyo.

The ceremony will be observed at the Meiji shrine at 8 a.m. November 3. The festival will take place at 11 a.m. Admiral Ryokitsu Arima, chief ritualist of the shrine and the members of the shrine will participate. Prince Michihide Kujo, master of ceremony of the Imperial Court will be dispatched to the ceremony by H.M. the Emperor.

It will be permitted to visit the shrine at night from November 1 to 3, until 10 p.m. Many bonfires will be lighted along the avenues leading to the shrine, which will be attended to by the members of the Tokyo Boy Scout.

Large arches will be constructed at the entrances. Motion picture shows will be given to the public in the compound of the shrine at the North entrance, every night from November 1 to 3.

Fire works will be set off in the Yoyogi field during the three days in the evening. A chrysanthemum show will be opened in front of the main hall. There will be a show of flower arrangement from November 1 to 4. Japanese classic sports including Yabusame and Shukyu will be given in the Yoyogi field at 1 p.m. November 1. Athletic games will be held in the outer track field of the shrine under the auspices of the Hoshukukai during the four days from November 1.

PRINCE CHICHIBU ARRIVES

His Imperial Highness Prince Yasuhito Chichibu, who is now on an inspection trip in Yamagata Prefecture, will arrive here by train at 3:25 p.m., today, accompanied by Princess Chichibu. Their Imperial Highnesses are scheduled to stay here for about a week.

During the stay here, Prince Chichibu, accompanied by Princess Chichibu, expects to visit the Imperial Palace to express to Their Majesties the Emperor and Empress his gratitude for his selection as the Imperial proxy at the coronation ceremony of King Edward VIII to be held in London next May. At the same time Prince Chichibu expects to seek Imperial permission for the tour he plans to make of the European and American countries after the ceremony at London.

13 Foreign Born Japanese Start Club In Sendai

Following the example of similar groups of young people in Tokyo and other large centers of population, a group of foreign born Japanese met in Sendai to organize an association.

The first meeting was held recently at the home of Mr. Donald L. Zoll, director of the Sendai Episcopal Student Center. Officers elected are as follows: President, Dr. Seizo Uenaka, born in New York City and now doing graduate work in the Imperial University Hospital; Vice-President, Miss Beatrice Yoshie, a native of Vancouver, British Columbia; the secretary, Miss Taka Kojima also from Canada and at present a student in the Shokei Jogakko. The charter membership consists of 13.

A constitution and details regarding the purpose and program of the club were discussed at the organization meeting. It is planned to have two meetings a month, one of which to be held if convenient, in the home of some resident foreigner. These meetings will be of a social and literary character. Ordinary business meetings are expected to be held in the Student Hall of the Seikokwai Church on Jozenjidori.

All Japanese born in any English speaking nations or who have had a residence in such countries of at least four years are eligible for membership and any one interested are requested to communicate with any of the officers or Mr. Zoll who is the adviser of the club. The name of the new organization is still under consideration and the final draft of the constitution is yet to be discussed and voted upon. The next meeting will be held November 14 at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Gerhard, 61 Kozenjidori Sendai.

SCHOOL PRESIDENT RECOGNIZED

Miss Clara D. Loomis, Honorary President of Kyoritsu Jogakko, located at 212 Bluff, Yokohama, who has served more than 35 years since she came to Japan and assumed the presidency of the school in 1900, is expected to be publicly recognized before long by the governor of Kanagawa Prefecture, it is reported.

Miss Loomis is popularly known as a foreign lady educator among the foreign and Japanese communities in the country and she is said to have contributed much towards the friendship of Japan and America. For the past 35 years Miss Loomis has made self-sacrificing efforts in the education of several thousands sons and daughters and in charity works in general. She will resign the honorary presidency of the school and expects to go back America.

Corn Belt Tackles New Soil Program

even a more general one.

Of Iowa's 215,000 farmers, 147,000 signed corn-hog contracts and 3,700 signed wheat contracts. Of Nebraska's 130,000 farmers, 84,000 signed corn-hog contracts and 34,000 signed wheat contracts.

These figures do not give the precise number of participants in the two programs, since they represent many duplications.

Generally farmers appear to have met the soil conservation plan in an amiable mood if not an enthusiastic one. As a rule, they readily furnished the work-sheet information from which the bases for participation were computed, whether or not they expected qualifying for grants.

Individual grants to be paid will run rather smaller than the benefits paid under wheat and corn-hog contracts, and, though participation may be more general, it is understood the total available for distribution in the Corn Belt will be considerably less than last year and the year before.

Timing of Payments

If payment is made, as is now expected, in December and January it will reach farmers at a time when the pinch felt by crop loss will be even sharper than it now is. It is obviously not complete coverage, but it will again operate as partial insurance at least. The grant to a small farmer who raised nothing can hardly carry his family and his stock through the Winter, but there must be many to whom it will be just the margin of help they need.

It is likely that the drought has brought a great many farmers into the conservation program who might otherwise have remained out. It is customary to sow such crops as clover and alfalfa with small grain as a nurse. A good deal of such seeding is believed to have been done with oats this year.

When it appeared likely that oats would not make much of a grain crop, a good many farmers pastured their fields or cut them before maturity for hay, leaving those fields with a grass crop which could qualify for a conservation grant.

Republican Hopes Rise In Four Voting Tests

position to reclaim Massachusetts.

The voters of Michigan virtually wiped that State from the hope-sheet of the Democrats unless Detroiters pour out in vast numbers for the President, something they failed to do in his interest recently. Senator Couzens, seeking Republican renomination on notice that he would vote for Mr. Roosevelt, got a far smaller vote than his courage and record seemed to assure.

In his stead former Governor Brucker, who cannot possibly compare with the Senator as a public figure, was easily nominated. And the Democrats had the utmost difficulty in putting over their Senatorial candidate against Father Coughlin's personal representative in Washington.

Wisconsin Stalwarts

Wisconsin primaries conclusively demonstrated that the La Follette or Progressive, voters, who are for the President, still retain a good majority in the State over the Republicans and the Democrats, and, with the Democrats, can easily put the State in Mr. Roosevelt's November column. But the regular Republicans—they call them the "stalwarts" out there—won an impressive second place in the totals and added a link to the new Republican party chain that is being forged across the land. The old one used to be detoured around Wisconsin.

Since no intelligent Republican professional expected to win Wisconsin's electoral vote this year, the proof that the party is returning to major status there, after two generations spent in thrall to the La Follettes, was the most heartening kind of news.

After all, many sensible Republicans are looking to 1938 and 1940 for their return to power, preferring a time when they can readily keep the promises they make to a victory when it would be far costlier than the last two defeats.

Von Papen In Hungary Seeking New Accord

Domei

BUDAPEST, Oct. 27—The arrival today of the German Ambassador to Austria, Colonel Franz von Papen, at Gyulavari, near the Rumanian border, ostensibly on a hunting trip, stirred up reports here that there are favorable opportunities of enlarging the three-Power Rome protocol.

Well-informed quarters point out that his visit to Hungary, at a time when Dr. Guido Schmidt, Austrian Undersecretary of Foreign Affairs, is meeting with high Government officials here to discuss the inclusion of Germany in the Italo-Austro-Hungarian Conference, is a clear indication that some sort of an understanding is being sought.

Meanwhile, reports from Vienna indicate that despite rumors to the contrary, the annual tri-Power Conference among Italy, Austria and Hungary, will be held in Vienna, as scheduled, on November 12.

Bill To Close Brothels In France Submitted

Domei

PARIS, Oct. 27—Renewed efforts to stamp out one of civilization's oldest scourges, prostitution, which has spread to alarming proportions since the World War, is being pushed by Mr. Henri Sellier, Minister of Public Health, who has today submitted to the Council of Ministers for approbation, a bill providing for the practical closure of all brothels throughout France.

Aiming at the protection of the French public which is being endangered by the ravages of social diseases, the the bill further provides that veneral contamination will be considered a legal offense and all offenders will be subject to severe punishment.

The bill further includes many measures for the prevention of anti-veneral diseases, repression of the growing white slave traffic, and the strictest control and protection of the public against syphilitic and blenorrhagial diseases.

FANCK EVENING

Dr. Arnold Fanck and Mr. Richard Angst gave lectures Saturday at the Imperial Hotel at a meeting held under the auspices of the Japan Motion Picture Association. Invitations to the meeting were sent out by Baron Tatsuo Yamamoto, former minister of Home Affairs.

Dr. Fanck and Mr. Angst have been in Japan since last February and have travelled all over the country taking pictures of places of beauty.

After the lecture meeting a dinner was given by Baron Yamamoto and the Japan Motion Picture Association in honor of Dr. Fanck and Mr. Angst. After the dinner Baron Yamamoto presented Dr. Fanck and Mr. Angst with two historic swords. The one presented to Dr. Fanck was Kaneuji, which is 468 years old and was made by the famous smith Kaneuji of Gifu prefecture, then called Mino-no-kuni. The sword which was presented to Mr. Angst was Kanesada, 264 years old and made by Kanesada, one of the famous 27 smiths.

After the dinner there was a motion picture show in the Imperial Hotel Auditorium. The first picture was one taken by Dr. Fanck and Mr. Angst in Japan and the other, a German picture called "King of Montblanc" which was brought by Mr. Angst when he came to Japan.

The International Women's Club of Yokohama has announced the following changes in its programs.

The musical program under the supervision of Mrs. R. Boller, scheduled for November 13, has been cancelled due to the unfortunate death of Mr. M. N. Schifferblatt, the featured violinist. On December 18 at 9 p.m., Mr. Maxim Schapiro, concert pianist, and Mr. R. Pallak, prominent violinist, will present a concert at the Hotel New Grand.

Due to a typographical error in the Year Book, the entertainment by the Federated Japanese Women's Club, erroneously scheduled for November 7, will be held on November 20.

The dramatic program, "Design for Living," under the direction of Mrs. H. V. Bleackley, scheduled for December 18, has been cancelled.

PRISON INDUSTRY BRINGS HIGH RETURN

The convicts serving in the Tokushima Prison, Shikoku, manufacture various articles totalling ¥250,000 in value annually. The institution has received recently an order from the Manchoukuo Government for 10,000 wooden dummy rifles and 3,700 other articles for bayonet exercise. As the result, the Tokushima Prison's revenue through its manufacturing industry is expected to surpass a ¥300,000 mark this year.

Explanation Given Of Psychology In East

is prone to take offense instead of appreciating the joke.

The Oriental's caution and secretiveness, his unwillingness to express a personal opinion, to answer searching questions, to take any but the most necessary actions if they are all out of the ordinary, are all expressions of an attitude of mind that is probably the result of the general despotic forms of government to which Orientals have had to submit from the earliest times. Men had to agree or seem to agree and to obey. Expressing individual and variant opinions only exposed them to punishment. With the spread of democratic and libertarian ideas, which first took root in the West, individualistic qualities and individualistic forms of expressions, free and untrammeled, will doubtless become a more general characteristic in the East as well as the West.

The differences which have been pointed out, are probably not differences of an inherent nature but have been induced by environment and social and political conditions which are today rapidly changing and becoming more uniform throughout the world.

Children brought up under a tyrannical parent exhibit traits similar to those I have here described as "Oriental." It is odd, too, but a fact nevertheless, I believe, that women generally, even in the West, until recently, at least, when they began to "flap" (their wings), are "Oriental." They won't give one a definite "yes" or "no"; they say, "just because" when one asks them "why"; they are passive resisters; they store up their grievances; they take refuge in silence. For uncounted generations, men have domineered it over women, have forced them to yield their wills and to hide their own personalities—and now the men write poems about woman's "sweet mystery"!

All this probably accounts for the fact that Westerners frequently profess to find something womanlike in Oriental men, though there is certainly no lack of physical masculinity. It may also account for the success of Oriental men with Western women. Greek meets Greek as it were.

Doctors Disagree On Facial Palsy

Dr. Tickle Disputes Dr. Sullivan On His Claims For A New Operating Technique

A marked difference of opinion developed recently in the discussion of a report on a new operating technique to relieve facial paralysis without facial tic or spasm offered by Dr. Joseph A. Sullivan of the Banting Institute, University of Toronto, at the convention of the American Academy of Ophthalmology and Otolaryngology, according to the New York Times.

Dr. Sullivan's claims of superior results were disputed by Dr. Thomas J. Tickle, surgeon of the Manhattan Eye, Ear and Throat Hospital. The specialists, assembled in the ball room of the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel from all parts of the United States and Canada, appeared to enjoy the discussion because of the background of both men and a final fillip from Carlyle.

Dr. Sullivan and Dr. Tickle served their internships together at the Manhattan Eye, Ear and Throat Hospital. Dr. Sullivan went to London to work with Sir Charles Ballance and Dr. Tickle remained at the hospital in association with Dr. Arthur B. Duel.

Surgeons Hold Different Views

Sir Charles and Dr. Duel were the outstanding authorities in the treatment of facial palsy and both died early this year. They had worked together and developed the first operative treatment for this baffling condition. In recent years the two eminent surgeons had differed over what changes occur in injured nerves and these differences were reflected in the statements of Dr. Tickle and Dr. Sullivan.

Dr. Tickle was supported by Dr. John R. Page and Dr. E. D. Fowler, both associates of Dr. Duel at the Manhattan Eye, Ear and Throat. They read prepared papers in discussing Dr. Sullivan's report. The Toronto surgeon ended the discussion gracefully by quoting from Carlyle:

"The craftsman there, the smith with that metal of his, with these tools, with these cunning methods, now little of all he does is properly his work. All past inventive men work there with him, as indeed with all of us in all things."

Offering his technique as an improvement on the methods of Sir Charles and Dr. Duel, Dr. Sullivan said he found it best, in case of facial paralysis from injury or mastoiditis reported two months after it had set in, to wait until six months after the paralysis before operating to repair the injured nerve with a nerve segment taken from the thigh.

Reports Many Successes

Dr. Sullivan said that facial spasm was due to a disturbance in the facial nucleus in the medulla, or nerve center in the brain for the facial nerve, and that if the injured nerve were allowed to undergo degeneration to a certain degree there would be much less likelihood in the repair of the facial nerve for spasm to result. He said that after successfully operating on 100 animals, he operated on twenty-five humans with only one failure, in which case the paralysis had existed twenty years and the nerve cells had completely degenerated.

Dr. Tickle and his colleagues, while commending Dr. Sullivan on his research and results, declared they could not agree with his conclusions. Claiming that facial spasm was due to a splitting of the neurofibrils in the graft and that a lapse of time for degeneration did not help, they said experience did not show less spasm after a wait of six months. Dr. Tickle said he found a larger proportion of cases of spasm where the grafting took place six months or more after injury.

Dr. Sullivan illustrated his report with motion pictures, and also reported a successful nerve transplantation in a case of paralysis after a skull fracture. This was said to be the first such case in surgical history.

New Radium Treatment

A new radium treatment for lung cancer was outlined by Dr. Joel J. Pressman of Los Angeles. Instead of the usual procedure of using radium seeds filled with raydon gas inserted with a bronchoscope, Dr. Pressman said he used tiny tubes containing 40 to 50 milligrams of radium in the bronchoscope.

Both Dr. Hayes E. Martin of Memorial Hospital, in reading a report on treatment of cancer of the larynx, and Dr. Gabriel Tucker of the University of Pennsylvania, in discussing the paper, urged the great importance of early discovery of cancer of the larynx. Dr. Tucker said that the early cancer can be cured in 70 per cent of the cases through a conservative surgical approach.

Highly beneficial results from the use of blood transfusions as a tonic, either preliminary to operation in weakened individuals or after destruction of the blood by infection, as in mastoiditis, were reported by Dr. John J. Shea of Memphis, Tenn.

The academy members held their annual banquet in the evening, honoring the memory of the late Dr. Herman Knapp, eminent American eye surgeon.

Murder Case Held Black Legion Doom

High Public Indignation Over Terrorism, Shown At Trials, Puts Members In Panic

DETROIT, Oct. 2.—Conviction of all except one of the twelve Black Legion defendants in a Wayne County court in connection with the murder of Charles A. Poole, WPA worker, is viewed quite generally as the death knell of the vigilante organization, which caused much alarm in Michigan and the rest of the country after the expose of its terrorist activities.

Like the Ku Klux Klan after which it was patterned, the Black Legion thrived when its activities were shrouded in secrecy and mystery, but as a result of the disclosure of its floggings and other crimes, the organization is believed to be rapidly disintegrating.

Evidence presented at the trial also tended to show that the organization was not as far flung as early reported, but that its membership was confined to the industrial cities of lower Michigan, with a few adherents scattered about the border line States of Ohio and Indiana.

Average Americans

Among those who joined were some "average" American citizens, who, without giving much thought to the matter, were induced to sign up for membership because they were naturally patriotic and felt the "100 per cent Americanism" and other tenets of the order were entirely satisfactory, says the New York Times.

Politically ambitious persons also saw in the Black Legion a chance to get into office. Like the old klan, the legion's appeal to racial and religious prejudices gained for it additional adherents. Most of these adherents, however, would revolt against the idea of committing acts of terrorism, and, as a result, quickly severed all relations with the order as soon as its activities became known.

The Communist party was quick to see in the Black Legion the birth of an American Fascist movement, and its workers and candidates for State offices are dwelling greatly on vigilante activities in their speeches.

The Michigan Federation of Labor, at its recent annual convention, condemned the Black Legion as being un-American and against the interests of organized labor, and adopted a resolution urging its affiliated unions to expel any members found to belong to the secret order.

No Links to Industry

High officials of the federation reported recently that, after a careful investigation, they could find no evidence that Detroit industrialists were connected with the legion, as was charged by Communist speakers.

Because public antipathy has been so bitter against the Black Legion, the fear of losing one's job or business patronage has had a devastating effect on organization. Eighty-six persons on the public payroll in Oakland County were alleged to be members and action was started to remove them from their positions.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

British Will Take Aden From India

BOMBAY.—Before the new constitution comes into force next April, India, from which Burma has been separated, also will lose Aden, a possession for the last 100 years. This little piece of territory at the entrance to the Red Sea is greatly valued for its importance to British Empire communications.

Recent developments in the Mediterranean and the Red Sea have impressed Britain with the need for creating a "Gibraltar of the East," and Aden, already a port of call and a cable center, will be turned to British naval uses.

It was not only the administrative connection between India and Aden that made it an Indian possession. Indian troops and Indian money were used in its conquest and purchase, and Indian merchants were responsible for its development as a port. And further, India has paid more than $600,000 annually toward the cost of its administration.

Outpost of Empire

From this expenditure, however, India will be relieved. Aden will be governed by the British Colonial Office through a British governor. There will be no legislature, but the governor will be helped by an executive council. Aden will become another outpost of the empire.

Though the separation of Aden has been ordered for reasons of naval strategy, it was suggested that since India is to become a federation with a legislature responsible to the people, a piece of territory more than 1,000 miles from the mainland is too far away for Indians to look after satisfactorily. The British, who have much experience of this kind of care, will manage the affairs of Aden from 3,000 miles away, says the New York Times.

As far as Aden is concerned, the transfer to the Colonial Office at least will improve the unity of its administration. At present the Aden Settlement, where Indians live, is part of British India. The surrounding territory, over which a British protectorate has been established, is managed by the British Colonial Office. The military and air forces stationed there are under the orders of the British War Office. The result is that the chief executive officer of Aden is at present acting under instructions received from three sources—British India, the Colonial Office and the War Office.

Taken together with British rearmament, the new status of Aden means a great increase in British naval power in the East. The communications to East and South Africa, India, the Far East and Australia will henceforth be well guarded.

Cape Town Speeds Defense Program

Harbor Fortification Included In South Africa's Plans For Armaments

CAPE TOWN.—The work of reinforcing the Union's military machine is taking shape. Oswald Pirow, South Africa's young and energetic Minister of Defense, has returned from London, where he conferred on means of safeguarding the Union of South Africa against foreign aggression. And the Union Cabinet has lost no time in approving the defense and air armament plans submitted by Mr. Pirow.

Extensions to Cape Town Harbor will be pushed ahead rapidly. While the port work is estimated to cost about $50,000,000, it is considered that such expenditure will yield an adequate return if more shipping is diverted around the Cape of Good Hope. The world shipping situation has changed materially since the long-range scheme for Cape Town Harbor was mooted and no doubt is felt that the port will receive an increasing volume of sea traffic, says the New York Times.

Harbor Fortifications

In view of the enhanced importance of Cape Town Harbor, it was deemed necessary that it should be fortified against attack by sea or air, and Mr. Pirow's discussions with the British Government have made it feasible for the harbor to be adequately protected.

In the end, the Union's defenses will be put into such a state of efficiency that not only will it be able to defend itself against attack, but will be able to play a strong part in assisting any adjoining territory whose interests are allied with those of the Union.

As an air-defense step, Mr. Pirow has been able to arrange with the British Government to secure a number of aircraft for training purposes at reduced prices, machines said to be much superior to those now owned by the Union.

The government intends to use for civil aviation purposes a type of machine which is easily armed. It is proposed to introduce services between England and South Africa three times a week. Feeder services will operate into the more remote parts of the African continent.

Pres. Benes Faces Little Entente

Pressure In Germany's Favor And Against Russia Expected

By G. E. R. GEDYE

VIENNA, Sept. 11. — The Little Entente conference which begins at Bratislava, on the Austro-Czech frontier, tomorrow affords Czechoslovakia the opportunity to acquaint her allies of the Little Entente—as President Benes's recent journey of speech-making in the Sudeten German area did to inform the minorities—of her considered attitude toward various urgent problems confronting the State.

Signs are not wanting that Nazi Germany's determination to isolate Soviet Russia from her allies will affect the forthcoming conference. The immediate if unavowed aim of the Nazis seems to be to persuade France and Czechoslovakia by veiled threats and offers of friendship, presented alternately, to cancel their pacts with Russia.

Throughout Central Europe signs are multiplying which point to the conclusion of a pact between the Vatican and Hitler whereby, in exchange for a new concordat, the Vatican will be prepared to throw its whole weight to the support of Hitler's new anti-Communist campaign. Germany aims at the isolation of Russia politically by creating a general scare about the "Communist danger."

The overthrow of Foreign Minister Titulescu of Rumania is revealed as the triumph of a remarkable German plot. So far did Nazi interference in Rumanian affairs go that German Gestapo agents were actually appointed to spy on Titulescu, as one of his closest friends revealed to The New York Times Bucharest correspondent. The resultant dossier compiled by Herr Himmler of the German police was handed to the Rumanian Fascist leader, Octavian Goga.

King Acts on Report

Goga hastened back to Bucharest and presented the dossier to King Carol, on whom it acted as the final spur to overthrow Titulescu on account of allegations that Titulescu had been active abroad against the interests of Carol's policies.

Thus Mr. Titulescu, whose unchangeable Francophilism led him to support a policy of friendship with Russia as the alternative to Hohenzollern Carol's hankering for Nazi Germany's friendship, will be absent for the first time in many years from a Little Entente conference where he and Mr. Benes in cordial agreement were accustomed to devise policies to which Yugoslavia agreed.

The Yugoslav Premier and Foreign Minister, Mr. Stojadinovitch, had been in Bucharest before the conference, which suggests that it is now Yugoslavia and Rumania who intend to lay down the policy to which it is hoped Czechoslovakia will have to adhere.

Yugoslavia is almost the last European country to refuse to recognize the Soviets. Mr. Stojadinovitch is believed in Belgrade to have become a warm supporter of a pro-German orientation. The assumptions seems therefore justified that he and Titulescu's successor will endeavor in Germany's interests to persuade Czechoslovakia to drop the Russian alliance. Berlin has made it abundantly clear to Prague that she demands this as the price of any agreement with Czechoslovakia which would assure those easier Czecho-German relations.

Benes's Refusal

Benes, however, made it plain that Berlin's price is too high. Russian friendship is Benes's reinsurance of the guarantees of Czechoslovakia's security afforded by the League covenant, the alliance with France and the other little Entente States.

There is little doubt that this will be Czechoslovakia's answer to any Rumano-Yugoslav attempt to persuade her otherwise. Short of this, however, her attitude has become extremely conciliatory.

Mr. Benes made it clear in his speech at Reichenberg last month that the Czechs have made many mistakes in their treatment of the German minority, which must not be repeated. Although he rejects emphatically any right of Germany or any one else except the League to exert pressure on Czechoslovakia, Mr. Benes promised that the fullest possible steps would be taken to remedy Sudeten German grievances.

While refusing to listen to the "catchword of autonomy," he promised the fullest decentralization and economic administrative regionalism. Germans are to receive a full share of State employment with the proviso that a democratic State cannot entrust its confidential posts to Fascists. The policy of bringing Czech workers into the German areas where unemployment is serious will be reversed.

the family is tranquil until a girl who understands the husband-father reenters his life. Gay and hilarious in its earlier reels the filmplay builds to one of the most tense situations created on the screen in some time.

In addition to Mr. Morgan and Miss Barnes, the cast includes Lois Wilson, as the wife, Louise Latimer, Universal's latest importation from Broadway, Elizabeth Young, who won distinction with Garbo in "Queen Christina," Robert Taylor, Alan Hale, Maurice Murphy, Dick Winslow, Helen Parrish and the noted New York comedienne, Margaret Hamilton.

The picture is one of the most wholesome of the year, deriving its sparkling, buoyant humor from the counterplay in a typical American home. The film reunites three of the memorable family of "Seed," Miss Wilson, Helen Parrish and Dick Winslow.

Lingering Death, Social Disease Not Discussed

papers not only deleted the words, but left out the whole speech. As recently as 1930, most New York papers ignored a campaign of the Bellevue-Yorkville Health Demonstration because it dealt with venereal disease. The New York Times and New York Herald Tribune have been mentioning syphilis by name only since about 1932. Not until August, 1934, did the tabooed word appear in the Baltimore Sun; it took the mighty bludgeoning pen of formidable Henry L. Mencken to break down that door.

Most of the "slick" magazines are still closed to the word; some won't even refer to it by the ostrich euphemism, "social disease". As for radio—the terror that goes by the name of Venus has no business lurking around the studios.

As recently as last November, Dr. Thomas Parran, Jr., then New York State Health Commissioner, was asked to give a radio talk over the Columbia Broadcasting System on recent progress in health work. It is well known that Doctor Parran, now United States Surgeon General is one of the most dynamic and effective fighters of syphilis in the country. But for the sake of the broadcasting system's sensibilities he determined to be exceptionally mild. Only one small paragraph in his proposed address mentioned the disease:

"We have made no progress against spyhilis, though its results crowd our jails, our poorhouses and our insane asylums. Yet there are specific methods of controlling it better known to science than the methods of controlling tuberculosis. We need only to do what we know how to do, in order to wipe out syphilis as a public health problem."

At the last minute some official of the station read that innocuous passage. Before his mind's eye rose up the faces of mothers, children, adolescents, imbecils, maiden aunts, angry fathers, faint-hearted clergymen, clubwomen—all and sundry whose tender minds it is radio's special function to protect. He ordered the offending paragraph out, whereupon Doctor Parran rightly refused to give any of the speech.

For, despite these obstacles, the log-jam of public silence seems to be breaking. We are apparently in for an era of new frankness about venereal disease, and to no little degree the change must be credited to the hard-hitting single-mindedness of the square-shouldered health executive President Roosevelt called to Washington last spring to head the United State Public Heath Service.

After Doctor Parran's little brush with the Columbia Broadcasting people, the Chicago Tribune tried a daring experiment. It published a series of full-page articles on venereal disease. The editors sat back, holding their breath, waiting for the rush of angry subscribers. Not a single one of them appeared; instead, congratulatory letters came actually pouring in literally by the bushel.

Then the Tribune's companion in New York, the tabloid Daily News, followed suit with a series of frank, concrete pieces giving detailed advice about self-protection. Far from an adverse reaction, the articles brought in 5,000 letters in the first two weeks. The Daily News republished the articles in booklet form, selling at a nickel each. Thousands have been sold. An additional 250,000 were distributed free by the New York City Department of Health. Net result: Attendence at the city's free venereal clinics increased 65 per cent.

Emboldened, newstands began to handle a pamphlet called "Lingering Death", by Dr. Winfield Scott Pugh, former Commander of the United States Navy Medical Corps. At 25 cents each, 100,000 copies are going fast; the publishers are getting ready for another run. In April, the Hearst-owned Washington Herald joined the procession with a series on venereal disease.

Plans Underway To Build Future City Of New York

that sixty square miles of the city's area is now unused. To this plottage may be added streets that were laid out in the expectation that the city would continue to grow indefinitely. In Queens, 26 per cent of the mapped "streets" are neither graded nor improved. Richmond shows a higher percentage. Brooklyn has streets mapped near Jamaica Bay which are submerged.

The Regional Plan Association joins the city committee in the belief that all this unused area should be reclaimed for use. Parks and parkways appear as an immediate need. Mr. Orton believes that reducing the total number of streets and making the main arteries larger will save money and expedite traffic.

By using the present vacant areas the city planners see an opportunity to build modern multiple dwellings with plenty of garden space, and with city parks located near by.

Parkway development is likewise important if the future city is to flourish. Main highways leading out of the city will not drain population from the metropolis, the committee feels. On the contrary such thoroughfares, with an attractive city at their terminals, will bring new residents into town. If the city dweller can reach open country conveniently, they see no reason for him to move out of the city.

Paralleling parkway development, the planners are giving serious thought to construction of truckways for the exclusive use of New York's 40,000 trucks. Many improvements have been made for pleasure cars, but virtually none for trucks. Truckways may prove a vital factor in expediting truck traffic and thereby improving traffic in general, the committee feels. It is now studying the possibility of having the police segregate certain streets for trucks.

Sewage Questions

Scientific sewage disposal on a comprehensive basis confronts the committee as one of New York's immediate needs. The Wards Island plant, expected to dispose of sewage from Manhattan and the Bronx upon completion, will put an end to the dumping of sewage into the North and East Rivers. The new Coney Island plant is operating efficiently, but the committee believes that the problem should be handled on a city-wide basis.

The new City Charter to be submitted to the voters in November sets up a City Planning Commission. If the new charter is adopted that commission may make immediate use of the committee's studies.

Buddhist Priest Says New York Will Get Shrine

dhist priests in the United States would conduct the English services, Dr. Seki said, but his wife, Satomi Seki, twenty-six-year-old Japanese who was born in America and graduated from the University of South-California. She was not exactly a Buddhist high priestess, Dr. Seki, who is thirty-four, explained, but spoke better English than he did.

A Liberal Sect

Dr. Seki explained that his sect, the Jodo-Shin, was the only one of the twelve groups into which Japan's 46,000,000 Buddhists are divided that allowed its clergy to marry. The Judo-Shin, the largest cult, with 9,000,000 adherents, further differs from the others by preaching a doctrine of faith, not of works. He said the ignorant as well as the wise, the sinful as well as the holy could attain "enlightenment" and enter the "Paradise of the West," or "Pure Land," provided they really believed in Amida, "the boundless light."

He said that the Zen sect, which stressed meditation and simplicity and was favored by the military castes, had made the only previous Buddhist invasion of New York, but had built no temple. Dr. Seki expressed optimism over his own forthcoming campaign, and as one bit of ammunition in it he flourished a letter of introduction to Mayor F. H. LaGuardia from Mayor P. J. Benbough of San Diego.

Observing an aversion toward Occidental haste, he remarked, "I shall present it in January."

Seen Nothing

A traveller was boasting in a public bar of all the wonderful things he had seen all over the world. He said there was nothing he had not seen.

A quiet little man got up from a corner of the bar and said politely: "Excuse me, sir, but have you ever had D.T.'s?"

"No, of course not," snapped the traveller.

"Then you've seen nothing," replied the little man quietly.

Logical

A man was entertaining some business friends one evening, when his little boy dashed into the room and announced breathlessly that he had just killed five flies.

"An' three were gentlemen, Daddy," he added, "and two were ladies."

The assembled company were somewhat startled by the revelation of such biological knowledge, and his father asked how he could tell which was which.

"Well," replied the boy, "two of them were on the mirror, and the others were round the whiskey bottle."

Automobile Show Held At Olympia

British Exhibitions Indicate Larger Engines, Reduced Weight, Improved Designs

The Motor Show opened at Olympia recently. At the beginning of this year there were 37,328,624 motor vehicles in use in the world. This figure showed a rise of nearly 2,500,000 over the previous year. Private cars and taxis accounted for 30,797,467 of the total and trucks and omnibuses for the remaining 6,000,000 odd. The British Empire share for 1935 was 12.7 per cent of the total as against 12.4 per cent in 1934.

Before reviewing the main lines along which progress in design is moving, some figures may be given relating to causes of breakdown, since this matter is closely allied to construction. The analysis has been supplied by the R.A.C. from the returns of their "Get-you-home" service, and as the figures are based on many thousands of cases, they form a fairly reliable indication of the modern car's weaknesses, says The Times, London. I have taken also, for comparison, the equivalent percentages of five years ago. Thus, it can be seen at a glance what are the weaknesses and to what extent they have been strengthened. It is necessary in some cases to make allowance for higher piston and average speeds, a lower standard of knowledge and skill in handling, a greater neglect in maintenance, and other factors. It is interesting to note how well brakes, front axle and steering, and road wheels and suspension, in their influence upon accidents, come out in the total percentage.

Taking in each case the figures for 1935 and 1931 respectively, ignition is far the worst offender at 22.9 and 20.8; carburation, 6.1, 3.5; cylinders and pistons, 9.1 and 10.1; valve mechanism, camshaft, &c., 3.2, 2.6; valves, 0.8, 1.3; lubrication, 1.6, 2.2; water circulation, 3.2, 2.2; crankshaft, 1.3 0.7; starting, 0.8, 1; also under engine but "not stated," 3.9, 5.5. Under the heading of transmission and brakes, clutch trouble is fairly high and shows but little improvement, the respective figures being 6.2 and 6.3; gearbox trouble is up being 3 against 2.9, which is probably accounted for by the more complicated mechanism now generally employed; couplings show improvement by the figure 2.3 against 4.2 in 1931. Brakes are 0.3 for both years. Axle shafts are 15.9 and 13.6; differential, 0.4, 0.9; bevels and worms, 1.1, 1; front axle and steering, 1.3, 3.2; road wheels and suspension, 2.6, 4.4, both showing good progress; lighting failures, 3.1, 2; accidents, 9.4, 12.3.

Larger Engines

The influence on public demand and consequently upon design of the reduction in horse-power tax in this country and the alteration in speeds allowed has had further effect, and noticeable features of British manufacturers' models for 1937 are cars with rather large engines—thus stepping up the types into higher-powered classes—and the improvement in acceleration by various means. It is clear that the widespread 30-mile-an-hour limits produce a strong desire to make up time on unrestricted roads. Greatest speed capacities continue to be raised for a given pattern of car, and as this is effected in British makes by increased efficiency it cannot well be deprecated.

Motor design is at an interesting stage. Many old ideas are being discarded, and there is much detail construction being worked out which shows great advance and will bear even more fruit in the future. The insistent demand for higher speed, and particularly higher average speed, which includes acceleration power, calls for a reduction of weight in comparison to power available, and this is where the scientific engineer is making good headway. This American industry travels along rather different lines owing to the widely varying ideas and conditions prevailing in the United States of travel, highways, manufacture, costs, and so forth. Nevertheless, the power-to-weight ratio is clearly kept in the forefront by designers, and, sometimes, rather at the sacrifice of stability according to British standards. There is, in my opinion, still much to be accomplished on this score, and it is likely that the car of 1943 will have a very different power-to-weight ratio as a whole than the one of 1937.

Weight Reduction

There is today a notable improvement in weight reduction of parts without sacrifice of strength, reliability, or comfort, in rather higher output for a given cubic capacity of engine in speed of pick-up, in flexibility, in quietness, in weight distribution and general safety, and in control. The closer relation being made with aircraft manufacture is all to the good. The 4-cylinder engine still holds its own well in this country, not surprisingly when some of the latest examples are tried. The 4-cylinder unit is used for the smallest cars of 8, 10, and 12 horse power and even up to the 14 type of high efficiency engine. These last are brilliant examples of the British maker's art, for with only four cylinders and a capacity of about 1¾ litre over 60 brake horse power is obtainable, while such a unit is quick and smooth in its running and more economical and reliable than many a much larger 6-cylinder unit of foreign manufacture. Generally speaking, however, six cylinders are the most favored, as this class of engine covers an increasingly wide range, which may run from about 12 nominal horse power up to 30 and more. The 8-cylinder, both in "V" form where two banks of cylinders are used with a common crankshaft and the straight-eight, shows that this class of power unit is being given more attention by designers of all nationalities. Nor has the 12-cylinder been forgotten, although at the present time such models are few, luxurious, and high-priced. The suspension of the power plant is continually being made more effective by detail alteration, and the absorption of mechanical vibration is now the rule rather than the exception.

The tendency to increase the bore of cylinders is noticeable this year and the new Fourteens and Seventeens are cases in point. Engine components show small modifications here and there, but taken as a whole the assembly under the bonnet remains much the same. The side valve is still widely popular, as is also the overhead valve worked with pushrods. General accessibility under the bonnet shows progress, particularly in some makes. Coil ignition is practically universal, the downdraught carburettor is much used, and the ventilated dynamo, the outside oil filter or cleaner, the non-adjustable thermostat for the water circulation, saves driver trouble and tends to better life of the battery, automatic control of the ignition, and a make-and-break and distributor which can really be got at for inspection with the least trouble are mainly standardized. The degree of automatism afforded in control and maintenance increases, but not so fast as a year or two back. Examples, besides thermostatic controls, automatic ignition, and automatic mixture, which have been fitted for some time now, are the increased use of automatic chassis lubrication, which now includes such parts as the steering box, the extended adoption of the automatic clutch, and bearings and joints which call for no attention on the part of the owner-driver.

Social and Parsonal Notes

SURGEON SCHOOL'S 50TH ANNIVERSARY

The 50th anniversary of the foundation of the Military Surgeon School will be celebrated at 9:20 a.m. Saturday, November 7 at the school in Ushigome. Their Imperial Highnesses Prince Kan-in, Prince Nashimoto, Prince Asaka and Prince Higashi-Kuni will be present. On the occasion of the anniversary, a memorial monument will be unveiled.

SON BORN

A son, Hans Jorg, was born to Dr. and Mrs. Marcel von Jacobi at the International Catholic Hospital Thursday.

TO GIVE ORGAN RECITAL

Mr. Shuichi Tsugawa will give a vesper organ recital at the Tokyo Y.M.C.A. auditorium, Kanda at 6 p.m. Saturday. The program will be entirely Russian, with many selections from Tschaikowsky and Moszkowsky.

HOSTS AT DINNER

Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Chamberlain entertained at a dinner Wednesday. Their guests were Mr. and Mrs. R. F. Moss, Mrs. Earnest Merrick, Miss Helen Lee, and Mr. M. J. Cox.

KOBE NEWS

A drama program of the Ai Rin English Circle will be given at the Ai Rin Kwan, Kamitsutsui, Kobe, from 7:30 p.m. November 12, Thursday.

The program is "Onshu no Kanata e" or "Better Than Revenge"; the work of Mr. Kan Kikuchi, translated by Mr. G. Shaw of the Osaka Foreign Language School.

A regular meeting of the Ai Rin English Circle was held at the Ai Rin Kwan, Kamitsutsui, Kobe, from 7:30 p.m. November 5. Mr. Glenn Shaw, professor of the Osaka Foreign Language School, spoke at the meeting on the subject of "Kikuchi Kan's Drama."

EXHIBITION OF THE SANBU-KAI

The autumn exhibition of the Sanbukai Sculptural Art Society was opened at the Mitsukoshi department store, Nihonbashi, on November 6, and will continue till November 11. This society was established by the leading sculptors and wood carvers of Tokyo including Messrs. Yuhachi Ikeda, Kakuji Ishikawa, Shokichi Hata, Uichiro Ogura, Yoshimitsu Kaihatsu, Hisatsugu Yoshida, Naoji Uyeda and Jitsuzo Hinako. They are exhibiting their recent works at the salon.

ART EXHIBITION OPENS

The Second Group of the Bunten, or the Art Exhibition of the Department of Education was opened at the Tokyo Prefectural Art Galleries, Uyeno Park at 9 a.m., Friday. It will be open till November 23.

Works by the former members of the Imperial Academy of Fine Arts and former frequent exhibitors to the academy exhibition are exhibiting their works which include Japanese water colors, sculptures, oil paintings, and decorative art objects.

YOKOHAMA NEWS

The proposed plan to inaugurate the establishment of a Yokohama Tourist Association is decided. Negotiations which have been going on between the Kanagawa Prefectural Tourist Federation and the Yokohama Municipality have been confused because the authorities of the federation refused to agree the proposal, due to the decrease of the federation members. Thus at the recent promoters' meeting the Yokohama Municipality submitted a plan to contribute ¥1,000 towards a fund for the enterprises of the federation to compensate for the deficit of income, but this was also refused by the prefectural authorities.

Equal Suffrage Is Up to Women In Philippines

They Get It If 300,000 Vote Affirmatively April 30 In Special Plebiscite

MANILA, Oct. 1.—Whether the women of the Philippines will get equal suffrage with men will be determined by the women themselves on April 30, 1937, when a plebiscite will be held throughout the Philippines to determine whether 300,000 Filipino women want to vote.

On September 30 President Manuel L. Quezon signed a bill authorizing the plebiscite as directed in the constitution. The constitutional provision, which annulled a law passed by the last Philippine Legislature and signed by former Governor General Frank Murphy, granting suffrage to women, directs the holding of a plebiscite among women one year after inauguration of the commonwealth.

300,000 Voters Needed

The constitution further provides that at least 300,000 women must vote affirmatively in order that woman suffrage may be granted. In the event the women fail to muster 300,000 affirmative votes, women's suffrage in the Philippines will be dead until the constitution is amended.

The framers of the constitution, by failing to respect the law then in effect granting suffrage to women, showed they were opposed. This was made more apparent by the requirement that at least 300,000 women must vote affirmatively at the forthcoming plebiscite; it was reported to the New York Herald Tribune, as most of the members of the constitutional assembly which drafted the charter were convinced it would be impossible to muster so many affirmative votes.

Leaders Confident

Leaders in the suffrage movement, however, believe they can get more than 300,000 women to vote for suffrage. The National Federation of Women's Clubs has started mobilizing the 900 woman's clubs to arouse interest among women in the towns and barrios. Women leaders estimate that 1,000,000 women are qualified to vote in the plebiscite. They expect at least 400,000 to register and at least 300,000 to vote for suffrage.

The women have been encouraged by a statement by President Quezon to the effect that he favored granting women's suffrage now.

"I want the women to get the 300,000 votes required of them at the coming plebiscite," Mr. Quezon said, "because if they fail to do so women's suffrage will be dead for many years."

Quezon Urges Hard Work

President Quezon jokingly admitted that he had told some women leaders to "go the limit" in their campaign, even to the extent of stuffing the ballot boxes, if that was the only way they could get the required 300,000 votes.

"I told them I would not prosecute them if they resorted to ballot box stuffing," he said, "because while they would be committing a technical violation of the election law the violation would not hurt anybody and would cause no harm to public interest. However, I reminded them that one big argument used by women in their campaign for suffrage was that with women voting the election would be cleaner. I am afraid I had the women stumped."

Canada Faces Tax Rise To Get Budget Balance

ern Canada, and its blow was felt from coast to coast.

Wheat Revenue Lost

Finances which would have come from transportation of wheat, where the annual yield had been 200,000,000 bushels, was lost. The purchasing power of 200,000 persons was cut, and unemployment created. This drought Mr. Dunning termed 'a terrible handicap," but he was hopeful that before the year's end other factors would offset the damage, which imposed a severe drain on Federal, provincial and municipal treasuries.

The fact that the Dominion government is down $159,989,000 for the fiscal year ending March 31 clearly shows why Mr. Dunning is warning of new taxation. Carrying charges on the national debt of $3,492,893,000 totaled $134,549,000, and these figures point the present program of conversion and debt consolidation started by the Mackenzie King government during this period of low interest rates.

The other severe burden forced on the taxpayers is a payment of $102,047,000 for relief, public works, equalization payments on the 1930 wheat crop and losses of the 1930 wheat pool stabilization operations. Helping the provinces pay their relief bills has been the Dominion's biggest expenditure.

With the glaring exception of Alberta, the provinces have done their best to shoulder as much of the load as they are able. Saskatchewan obtained an agreement, involving sacrifices on both sides, with mortgage and other loan companies to whom drought-stricken and other farmers were heavily indebted.

Negotiations Stressed

The Saskatchewan government maintains that the most satisfactory method of debt adjustment is that of negotiation and agreement to preserve the province's credit. Across its western border, in the social credit wonderland of Premier William Aberhard, the investing public throughout Canada has been robbed of tens of millions of dollars by repudiation of debts.

Quebec is also helping Mr. Dunning by slashing expenditures and seeking British capital for investment by floating a loan. Negotiations are under way with English financial interests. Premier Maurice Duplessis is busy "housecleaning" after the exit of the Taschereau administration, and announces drastic economies. Apparently he believes this action alone will achieve the end sought by Mr. Dunning, for he believes there is too much taxation in Quebec.

"Our first step will be to reduce taxation, not increase it," Mr. Duplessis said in announcing plans to "repair some of the damage done by the last administration."

The government will obtain the services of experts to review the taxation system so as "to assure the necessary revenue for the operation of the province's affairs, and also to guarantee the taxpayer equitable distribution of taxes."

In his task of maintaining unimpaired the credit of the country, Finance Minister Dunning is receiving unstinted support even from those on whom the financial strain is greatest, and his ideal of a balanced budget may be nearer than he is willing to admit.

Italy Sees Gains From Cut In Lira

abolishing the 15 per cent ad valorem import duty, which was applied in 1931 when the pound sterling abandoned the gold standard, and by suppressing the system of private barter, which caused the prices of some materials to increase by as much as 25 to 30 per cent.

Moreover, it must be considered that raw materials represent only a small part of the cost of a finished article, the greater part being represented by labor. All things considered, experts think the cost of articles manufactured in Italy with Italian materials will not increase at all and that the cost of articles manufactured with impored raw materials will not increase more than 5 or 10 per cent.

If these calculations are correct, a considerable margin should be left between the amount by which the lira has been devalued and the amount by which Italian prices will rise, and this margin will go to the benefit of Italian exports.

Hungarian Status Revision Opposed By Vienna Circles

Raising Question At Austria, Italy, Hungary Conference Objected

Domei

VIENNA, Nov. 3—Despite Italian Premier Benito Mussolini's special reference in his Milan speech last Sunday, official circles here are unwilling to raise the question of revision of Hungarian status in the course of the forthcoming Vienna conference to be participated in by representatives of Austria, Italy and Hungary, well-informed quarters understood here today.

Dr. Guido Schmidt, State Secretary for foreign affairs, meanwhile stated to the press today that he strongly desires some agreement be reached between the Danubian States regarding the Hungarian question, which, he believed, will be dealt with in the course of diplomatic conversations directly following the Vienna tripartite conference.

Political quarters here voiced the view that the Italian Premier's speech should be regarded purely as an Italian political demonstration and by no means as a preface to the Vienna three-Power parley.

Austrian Cabinet Shake-Up Involves Five Portfolios

De Facto Recognition Already Given Ethiopian Empire By Vienna

Domei

VIENNA, Nov. 3—Personal differences of opinion among the ministers today resulted in a suden reshuffling of the Austrian cabinet as Chancellor Dr. Kurt Schuschnigg, all within the space of a few hours, first presented the Government's collective resignation and then formed a new ministry involving changes in five principal portfolios.

Baron Ludwig Hulgerth, retired lieutenant field-marshal and former commander-in-chief of the Austrian militia, was named vice-chancellor in place of Major Edward Baar-Baarenfels, while Dr. Ludwig Draxler was replaced by Mr. Rudolf Neumayer, Social Christian leader, in the Finance Ministry.

Other changes were Dr. Wilhelm Taucher, Catholic professor of Graz University, who was named minister of trade in place of Mr. Fritz Stockinger; Baron Odo Neustaedter-Stuermer, former Heimatschutz official, appointed minister of public security; and Mr. Glaise Horstenau, pro-German catholic, named minister of interior excluding control over the police.

Elimination of Dr. Draxler, semi-official sources indicated, does not mean any alteration in the Government's financial policy. The reshuffle, they said was merely due to personal conflicts of opinion within the cabinet having no influence on major policy trends.

De Facto Recognition

Domei

VIENNA, Nov. 2—Though Germany was the first Power to grant formal recognition to Italy's new East African Empire, Austria had already accorded de facto recognition some time previously and a formal move, if taken later, will only confirm that situation, political quarters declared here today.

De facto recognition was implied in the credentials which Baron Egon Berger-Waldenegg, former Austrian foreign minister, took to Rome when he was appointed minister to Italy some months ago, these quarters said. The credentials were addressed to Victor Emmanuel, "King of Italy and Emperor of Ethiopia."

President Wilhelm Miklas, in a public speech, also indicated that Austria accepted the Italian Empire in East Africa as an accomplished fact, it was added.

Publicity

The old miser was nearing his end and was dictating his last will and testament.

"And to each of my employees who has been with me five years or more, I bequeath the sum of two thousand pounds."

"That's very generous," said the lawyer, in admiration.

"Not at all," said the sick man,

Mexico Loses But Thrills Cohorts With Touchdown

MEXICO CITY, Oct. 10—A ninety-yard punt return by Lolo Rivadeneyra for the locals' only touchdown gave the Mexico University football team's supporters their greatest thrill of the season today as the school dropped its only international engagement to Occidental College, of Los Angeles, 1 to 6.

After Occidental's attack rolled by three touchdowns in the first three quarters, the fleet, shifty Rivadeneyra near the game's end, took Tweedie's booming punt on his ten-yard line, caught the defense off balance and sped along the sideline the entire distance to the goal. Navas failed to convert.

The line-up:

Pos.	Occidental (19)	Mexico (6)
L.E.	Ingles	Alonso
L.T.	Waltz	Cadenza
L.G.	Benioff	Diaz
C.	Carmona	Arriola
R.G.	Jeffries	Flores
R.T.	Nunn	Martinez
R.E.	Creese	Ceballos
Q.B.	Hough	Castro
L.H.	Sandiffer	Rivadeneyra
R.H.	Peters	Girard
F.B.	Groves	Mendez

Score by Periods

Occidental	6	7	6	0	—19
Mexico	0	0	0	6	— 6

Touchdowns—Groves, Hough, Kinard (substitute for Creese), Rivadeneyra. Point after touchdown—Groves.

SUCCESSFUL NOH PLAY AT THE HOSHO THEATER

The monthly Noh performance of the Hosho Noh Theater, Suidobashi, was held at 10 a.m. last Sunday. The program consisted of several famous Noh plays performed by the leading Noh players.

The "Kou" was performed by Messrs. Rei Kondo and Shigeyoshi Mori; the "Sanemori" by Messrs. Shigefusa Hoshe and Shin Hosno; the "Mutsura" by Messrs. Kanzo Kondo and Yaichi Mitsumoto; the "Tenko" by Messrs. Kenzo Matsumoto and Kanesuke Noguchi and the "Shaso" by Messrs. Susumu Takahashi and Tokiji Karasawa. The Kyogen performances, including the "Tatorigawa," and "Kitsunezuka" were also played by Messrs. Tojiro Yamamoto and Iwakichi Yanada. Among last Sunday's plays the "Mutsura" and the "Tenko" were the best of all. The former is a play of the spirit of the maple tree and the latter is of a classic Chinese legend telling of a drum that came from the Heaven.

The next performance will be "Su-Utai" which will be given at 6 p.m. November 19. The next Noh performance will be given at 4:30 p.m. December 2, and the program will be "Hashi-Benkei," "Kinumaki," and "Kurotsuka" and "Suho-doshi" (Kyogen).

Father Divine Wins Support Of Negroes

and his words sound somewhat monotonous. Now and then one of his sentences will be simple, short and pithy, but mostly they are long, cumbersome and vague. He coins more new "words" than a Broadway columnist, and such as physicalate, omnilucent, intutor, invisibilization, contagionized. Two secretaries take down his words in shorthand.

He starts to talk slowly, almost apologetically, but soon "the spirit takes hold of him—his words come fast—and he moves backward a step, so as to have more room to gesticulate. Warmed-up now and playing it "high," he rants and raves and leaps and throws out each word like a K. O. punch.

Expressive Movement

In speaking he makes full use of his arms, feet, body and of facial expressions. With his arms reaching, but not stretched, towards his audience, the elbows slightly bent and his hands turned inward, as though he is ready to pull his heart from his body, he tells them: "When I say, make your mental and Spiritual Contact, it means to contact me by harmonizing with my views and dialing in on the same, by doing exactly what I would have you do." Also, "How can you make your contact, if you are living in races, creeds and colours?"

In between their hallelujahs, he impresses on them, "This truth has been birthed out." In other words, born in him. He continues, "It is not confined to a person or persons, but is with the sonship degree of God, which am I. It's wonderful. It's brought into experience and manifested by one even so is the fathership degree which am I. It can be universalized. I spoke last night through the telephone, but I don't have to speak through the telephone. I am everywhere. It's a blessing that one is ignorant enough to be radical enough to visualize some that has been materialized, the same can be expressed by some one else." And plagiarizing the question Jesus Christ asked the Apostles, he loudly inquires,

"What do you call me?"

They answer: "God," and almost swoon in their own enthusiasm.

He speaks for an hour and in the middle of a sentence says, "Peace I must go," and disappears through the curtains at the rear.

It is not unlikely that Father Divine receives a greater and more whole-hearted devotion from his followers than any one in the history of this nation ever received. What is the secret of this devotion? It is not difficult to tell. He is their champion, for who else has ever, in the history of their race, hitched the wagon of that race to so high a star? He is their father, for who else but a father (or mother) would so unselfishly shower them with such material abundance, asking nothing whatever in return? He is their lover, for who else but a lover would forgive their shortcomings so generously? He is their teacher, for who else but a teacher could point their way to happiness?

But more than champion, more than father, more than lover, more than teacher, more than all four together, he is their child, for have not they made him?—and have they not made him God—and most of them would willingly and happily lay down their lives for him? Just his name on their lips was enough to take the sting out of death for three disciples, two men and one woman, who were recently burned to death in a fire in a Newark tenement, after having refused help which would have saved them.

Bishop Says Nazis Distort Papal Aim

Church Has Not Been Permitted To Give View For Fighting Communism

BERLIN, Oct. 12.—The Roman Catholic Bishop of Berlin, Count von Preysing, protests in a new pastoral letter against repeated suppression by the secret police of declarations and documents issued by Catholic Bishops of Germany.

He asserts even the publication in full of the Pope's addresses is forbidden. The letter states such tactics, combined with misrepresentation of the church in the National Socialist press, falsify the church's real teachings and its real stand on present issues.

In particular, the Bishop asserts that this suppression, combined with articles appearing in the press, has been calculated to give the German people the false idea that the Catholic Church is not genuinely combating the spread of communism. The letter states:

"For any one wishing to see, it is an evident fact, proved a thousand times, that the Catholic Church has always fought the sharpest fight against bolshevism. A multitude of declarations by the Holy Father and the German Episcopate and innumerable articles, brochures and pamphlets are in evidence. The assertion that the church is guilty of neglect in its defensive struggle with communism strikes truth in the face, and the assertion that the church has made an alliance with communism, in view of the mortal enmity of communism toward the church, is marked from the first as a lie and an insult.

"The German Bishops expressed in their recent pastoral letter their all too justified anxiety for the church's rights and liberty. At the same time they called attention in the most earnest words to the terrible danger threatening the church through bolshevism and summoned the laity to unite in defense.

"If this summons to a united front against bolshevism did not receive sufficient notice and has not been so effective as expected, the reason is that any distribution of this pastoral letter in the form of pamphlets, with the exception of official diocesan gazettes, was forbidden.

"The Catholic gazette for the Berlin Diocese, my paper, was seized and suppressed, although this form of making documents public is explicitly guaranteed in the concordat. Immediately after the seizure I protested telegraphically to competent authorities.

"The Holy Father, speaking before 500 Spanish refugees, issued to the whole of Christendom and to the whole world a declaration of unequaled fervor against that atheism which finds expression in bolshevism. This statement of policy, which appeared in the official document to the apostolic chair, by order of the State authorities could only be read in the churches.

"The German press cited only part of the papal remarks. The multitude of people who desired to read this address unabridged were not allowed to do so. I prepared 120,000 pamphlets of this address for distribution through the diocese priests. The pamphlets were seized and suppressed. I have also protested this seizure.

"The German Bishops are profoundly anxious about the fate of sectarian schools. These earnest anxieties, which the true Catholic laity share, were expressed in the pastoral letter, which, because of an official decree, likewise could not be distributed in the form of pamphlets."

The letter referred in the beginning to recent attacks on Catholic Bishops in the National Socialist press, distributed throughout the nation by the government news service. It concludes with a further defense of sectarian schools and a review of the actions taken against bolshevism by the church in Germany.

Ancient Relics Of Eskimo Race

1,000 Year-Old Discoveries Shed Light On Prehistoric Alaska

Eskimo armor, worn in ancient battles in prehistoric Alaska 1,000 years ago, and weapons, tools and household articles that add greatly to knowledge of life in the Far North before the dawn of history, have been unearthed by a joint expedition of the National Geographic Society and the Smithsonian Institution.

"Preserved for many centuries in the perpetually frozen Alaskan soil, the relics furnish valuable new knowledge of two ancient Eskimo cultures or primitive 'civilizations' of Alaska, and fill important gaps in the history of the ancestors of the modern Eskimo."

Old Eskimo "Thule Culture" Spread From Alaska

"The remains were excavated during the past summer under the leadership of Henry B. Collins, Jr., of the Smithsonian. Assisting him were James A. Ford of Louisiana State University and Harrison Prindle of Washington, D. C.

"The armor which the expedition uncovered was made of slats of bone, similar to the slat armor used by some Asiatic tribes. Other finds included harpoon and arrow heads, fish lines of flexible whale bone, fragments of clothing, cooking utensils, combs, awls, needles, ceremonial masks and even toys carved in exact imitation of full-sized boats, animals, etc.

"Working at and near Cape Prince of Wales, westernmost point of the North American Continent, the expedition excavated mounds of prehistoric rubbish accumulated over long periods from villages long since abandoned. One of the mounds was eight feet deep, and digging was a slow process because the frozen ground thawed only a few inches each day.

Discoveries Link Two Old Civilizations

"The archeologists uncovered the first site of the old Eskimo 'Thule Culture' ever found in Alaska. The 'Thule Culture' was the stage of development attained by the Eskimos previous to the stage they had reached when found by the first white explorers, and is characterized by certain types of tools, weapons and art objects.

"The Thule Culture spread all over Arctic North America and even to Greenland. While it has been known to exist in those regions for some time, the new finds confirm the important fact that it spread eastward from Alaska. These proofs were found in a mound located previously by Dr. Diamond Jenness of the National Museum of Canada, who made the first systematic excavations in Arctic Alaska.

"In the same mound the expedition found evidence that the Thule Culture was derived from a still earlier one known as the Birnirk Culture which once flourished in the region of Point Barrow. In successive layers downward in the mound, harpoon heads gradually changed from the Thule style to that of the Birnirk type. This establishes continuity between the two cultures and closes a gap that previously existed between them.

"Two miles from this location the archeologists found another older mound in which the remains were entirely of the Birnirk type. This was the first discovery of a site of the 'Birnirk Culture' outside the Point Barrow region. In other mounds the expedition found remains of more recent times, and thus was able to piece together a complete picture of Eskimo development in that locality over many centuries."

Italian Plans For The Future

mediate post-war mentality, considered here abnormal and exultant, in which these documents were framed.

By the nature of things, it is held here, 1918 invoked the wrong juridical mood to secure international justice.

League Reform then entered Italian policy as a necessary sequel to the destruction of the peace treaties. Equal rights among the Great Powers and reconstruction of the League on a basis which does not give parity of rights to all members, but places joint responsibilities on the Great Powers—these are the aims of Italy towards a reformed League.

Four Tasks

The declared tasks of Italy are four.

1.—To draw closer to tried friends.

2.—To impose internal discipline so as to present a solid national front to the world in international affairs.

3.—To achieve economic independence as much as possible; and

4.—To offer loyal collaboration, but always under conditions favorable to Italian interests.

These can be accepted as the motives underlying the plans upon which Signor Mussolini is today deliberating. When and how Britain comes into this framework is, however unknown. Everything seems to depend on the Mediterranean question.

Snapper

A small boy leading a donkey passed a group of sailors on liberty. A couple of sailors wanted to have some fun with the lad. "What are you holding on to your brother so tight for, Sonny?" asked one of them.

"So he won't join the Navy," the lad replied, without blinking an eye. —The Job Order.

again, together with Miss Carroll. He takes them aboard his junk where he intends to torture them into revealing the hiding place of the money which neither of them know.

Miss Carrol discovers she loves Cooper and to atone for her duplicity in leading to his capture, offers to pay Yang with her life if he will permit Cooper to go. Before this becomes necessary, however, Yang is shot in a scuffle. Realizing he is about to die, he orders his soldiers to kill Cooper and the girl and then to kill themselves so that he can enter heaven with an entourage befitting his rank. Just as the soldiers are about to fire, Cooper begins a desperate gamble for life by playing to Yang's vanity.

The part of General Yang is played by Akim Tamiroff, skilled depicter of sinister oriental roles. The picture was directed by Lewis Milstone and the screenplay was written by Clifford Odets, the young playwright whose recent works have created a mighty stir among dramatic critics throughout the country.

spectacular musical number possibly ever filmed; Virginia Bruce, former Ziegfeld beauty, in another musical number "A Pretty Girl is Like a Melody," that challenges description; Ray Bolger, spectacular dancer of the Broadway stage in another dazzling number, "You."

Besides these stellar entertainers, "The Great Ziegfeld" has Frank Morgan as Ziegfeld friendly enemy, Nat Pendleton as the great Sandow, strongest man in the world, Reginald Owen as Ziggy's business manager.

Not only does this amazing film unfold the life of Ziegfeld, but it presents a cross-section of the American theatrical world for the past quarter of a century.

The settings alone, designed by Cedric Gibbons, are unsurpassed in film history. They begin with the World's Fair of 1893 and include gorgeous theatrical settings of the many theaters that served as Ziegfeld's glamorous world.

In no picture to date have so many beautiful girls been assembled as was done for "The Great Ziegfeld." As Ziegfeld would have glorified them, so have they been glorified in the film.

The direction is superb, with Robert Z. Leonard reaping the laurels for the dramatic sequences and Seymour Felix for the dance and musical spectacles.

"The Great Ziegfeld" adds another triumph to Hunt Stromberg's long list of successes and to him goes a big hand for his courage in producing a musical picture on such a stupendous scale and making every foot of it entertainment in the highest degree.

Panama Canal Toll Loss Placed At $92,000,000

Zone Administration Brief To Commission Assails Dual Measuring System

By JOHN KELLY

N.Y. Herald Tribune

NEW YORK, Oct 11.—The claim that the United States government has lost approximately $92,000,000 in tolls over a twenty-two-year period because of the dual measurement system for vessels using the Panama Canal, is made by the Canal Zone Administration in a brief submitted to President Roosevelt's commission that is studying the problem with the view of recommending remedial legislation by January 1. The authorities charge that foreign shipping is the chief beneficiary of the present dual system of measurement and recommends that a single system as provided in the Panama Canal act be adopted.

A big number of American steamship operators, on the other hand, are opposed to any change in the method of collecting tolls unless it is provided that the system adopted, results in no increase in the tolls which any American company would pay under the present system.

Johnson Heads Commission

The commission, which is comprised of Professor Emory R. Johnson, of the University of Pennsylvania; Rear Admiral George H. Rock, United States Navy (retired), head of Webb Institute of Naval Architecture, and former Governor Arthur J. Weaver, of Nebraska, opened hearings in Washington last Wednesday, and Panama Canal authorities, the American Steamship Owners Association and several individual operators presented their views. All parties were given permission to file additional briefs and further hearings may be held later at several port cities in the United States.

As a result of two Presidential proclamations the tolls for commercial vessels using the Panama Canal were fixed at $1.20 per net ton, with 40 per cent reduction for vessels in ballast. This system was known as the Panama Canal rules of measurement, but under an opinion of the Attorney General dated November 25, 1914, the terms 'net registered tons' was used in the Panama Canal Act to fix the limit of tolls was interpreted to mean net registered tons determined under the United States rules of measurement.

Net tonnage as determined by the Panama Canal rules is in almost all cases materially greater than net tonnage under the United States rule. It has therefore followed under this dual system that as a general rule tolls on laden vessels have been based on their United States tonnage, while those on vessels in ballast have been levied on their Panama Canal tonnage.

Seek Big Traffic Volume

The brief submitted by the government officials in charge of the Canal, follows in part:

"Panama Canal authorities, throughout all the years, while endeavoring to correct the only feature of Canal administration and operation not based on equity, merit and efficiency, have not relaxed in their efforts to make the Panama Canal attractive to shipping. In recommending legislation designed to remedy the situation careful consideration has always been given to probable effect on shipping interests and the volume of traffic, since traffic is the life blood of the canal.

"During the whole twenty-two years of canal operation (1914-'36), vessels have paid $92,000,000 less under the dual measurement system than would have been paid under Panama Canal measurement rules, if the toll rates fixed in 1912 had continued to be collected. Of this amount foreign-flag vessels benefited to the extent of approximately $51,000,000, and American vessels in the sum of about $41,000,000.

"Thus, for every dollar of benefit granted to American vessels, a benefit of more than $1 has accrued to foreign-flag vessels. During this period the tonnage of American vessels represented 44 per cent of the total traffic and foreign vessels 56 per cent. The report of the Bureau of Efficiency pointed out that if the dual system was to be continued on the theory that American shipping must be thus protected against any increase in tolls, it constituted one of the most costly forms of ship subsidy that could be devised.

Single System Is Urged

"That the dual system is unsatisfactory has been admitted by all concerned. It should be abolished and a single system substituted therefor, based on the Panama Canal rules of measurement, with such modifications in those rules as seem justified by existing conditions and the development in vessel construction as determined by the independent study now being conducted by the neutral committee appointed for the purpose by the President of the United States. This can be accomplished only by legislation."

It is recognized in the brief that failure to make provision for the modification of the Panama Canal rules might well have had the effect of restricting or limiting the use of the canal and to have reduced the tonnage of traffic through this waterway.

"Cognizance has been taken that specialization in ocean freight services have brought about important changes in the design of general cargo carriers," the brief continues. "It is quite probable that such changes may suggest the advisability of some modification of the Panama Canal rules of measurement, while at the same time adhering to the primary principle of the Panama Canal rules that tolls charged should be in direct ratio to the earning capacity of the vessel."

The canal authorities also recommend that in the fixing of tolls, consideration be given to the operation and maintenance of the canal on a completely self-sustaining basis, in accordance with recognized business practice; including adequate provision for the ultimate amortization of the capital cost of the canal. Also the establishment by Congress of maximum and minimum rates of tolls a Panama Canal ton.

Town Of Four Names

Indiana has a small town of about 100 people that has four names—Tailholt, Carrollton, Reedville, and Finly. In 1854 an admirer of General Carroll gave the town its original name, Carrollton. But James Whitcomb Riley liked the name Tailholt, and made the village famous in his poem called "The Little Town o' Tailholt". Then the railroad came and, for some unknown reason, named the station Reedville. When a quarrel came up about a post-office, Congressman Finly Gray was appealed to, and by popular consent the postoffice was named Finly.

The Strangest Lake

The Lake of Cerknica, province of Banovina, Yugoslavia, covering an area of 10 square miles to a depth of 60 feet and very rich in fish suddenly empties in the spring, leaving its bed completely dry. Fodder and grain are raised on the bottom of the erstwhile sea. After the crops are harvested the lake fills out again in the Fall and the waters return as mysteriously as they had previously vanished.

HIS MAJESTY SENDS MESSENGER

Colonel Yasushi Sakai, aide-de-camp to His Majesty, was ordered by His Majesty the Emperor to inspect the Kwantung Army and to inquire after the various garrisons attached to it, it was officially announced by the Imperial Household Department.

It is reported that Colonel Sakai will leave Tokyo for Hsinking the middle of next month, carrying with him the messages of Their Majesties the Emperor and Empress to General Kenkichi Ueda, Commander-in-chief of the Kwantung Army and Japanese Ambassador at Hsinking. Later, he will visit the various garrisons stationed in Manchoukuo in order to convey the Imperial gifts of sake and cigarettes granted to the soldiers there.

IMPERIAL CHRYSANTHEMUM PARTY HELD

The annual Imperial chrysanthemum viewing party was held at the Imperial gardens at Shinjuku Tuesday, in the presence of Their Majesties the Emperor and Empress. It was attended by high Government officials including members of the Hirota Cabinet, officers of the Army and Navy, members of the foreign diplomatic corps and civilians, and their wives, numbering some 7000 in all.

The stream of the distinguished guests began to pour into the Imperial gardens from noon onward. Their Majesties the Emperor and Empress left the Imperial Palace by motorcar attended by Imperial Household Minister Tsuneo Matsudaira, Grand Chamberlain to His Majesty Admiral Kantaro Suzuki, Chief Lady-in-waiting Shizuko Takeya and other court officials at 2 p.m. Upon arrival at the Imperial gardens, Their Majesties took a brief rest at the Japanese house, where they met with Princes and Princesses of the Blood.

Their Majesties then received in audience at the temporary audience hall the members of the Cabinet, foreign diplomatic representatives, and other high Government officials who were accompanied by their wives.

Their Majesties the Emperor and Empress left the Imperial Gardens for the Palace by motorcar at 3:35 p.m.

Military Economy Strains Germany

ported to the New York Times.

It is estimated that Hitler's second Four-Year Plan will cost almost as much as his first, which climaxed with Germany's rearmament. But the first Four-Year Plan has already so strained the country's financial and economic resources that National Socialist spokesmen have been forced to appeal to the populace to sacrifice "butter for cannon." Where the money is to come from for the second Four-Year Plan is still a mystery, and what the populace will be asked to sacrifice for its sake is the anxious query of every German today.

Greater Degree of Control

The National Socialist solution of the problem is simple; it is more "socialism." This means more control of profits, wages and prices, more regimentation of both industry and labor in the direction of what one bold spirit has already advocated for Germany in case of war, namely, "military communism," which is all the more interesting in view of the Bonapartism rising in Communist Russia. National Socialist propaganda is already moving in that direction. Rudolf Hess, deputy leader of the Nazi party, recently described Germany as "one big Alcazar," which has similar implications.

Against this prospect are rising all the orthodox elements or, as National Socialists would say, all "capitalist economy," especially the industrialists and financiers, who hold that the extremist program may be heroic but is not economics. They fear that it will cripple German finances and morale; they believe that Germany's salvation lies in a closer contact with world economy, which would enable her to export more in order to import more. They likewise hold that such development is the first condition for creating a certain amount of wartime autarchy.

One means of achieving that end would be a formal devaluation of the German currency and adhesion to the Atlantic currency bloc centering around the United States, Great Britain and France. Such devaluation is vetoed by the National Socialist rulers for the moment, first, for reasons of prestige, and, second, because they are as yet unwilling to pay the political price for those economic concessions from the outside world which are needed to make devaluation really effective.

Forces for Devaluation

Yet there are three inexorable factors which, in the view of foreign observers, are driving Germany to swallow the bitter pill like the rest of the world. One is the precarious state of her foreign trade, the second is the attenuated state of her public finances, and the third is her rapidly rising price level, which in itself is merely a symptom of the depreciation of her currency which already is taking place.

But the answer to the question when Germany will devalue may be supplied in the trade returns for the coming months, when the new devaluation wave has hit Germany's exports figures and when the burden of the German domestic debt has become too large to bear.

The World's Revolving Stage

Many other criticisms.

The army of dole-taking or charity-fed unemployed maintains gigantic proportions; but it is better-fed, better controlled than it was. Its numbers are said to be diminishing. That is not bad a report about a highly inflammble element in the nation's society. But the problem is not solved.

Old-fashioned Americans recall the nation's pristine ideals opportunity open to all, no insurmountable class barriers, work done for reward and reward not withheld, self-respect and the respect of others, and the noble obligation—not to be relegated to town, country or state—for every man to aid his own, up to the last ounce of his capacity.

The Soft Or The Hard Way

The Roosevelt regime dissipates more than money, say these old-timers. It wastes the good old American birthright of courage, initiative, fortitude and aspiration.

Probably they are right. But what would have been the consequences if, instead of sugaring the great American public, an effort had been made to harden them? Would they have prospered materially and spiritually—and re-elected Roosevelt.

No doubt President Roosevelt believes that the best way to insure the well-being of the United States is to plant all the great areas which are so fertile for harvests of discontent, with sugar, and to nourish them with his smile of optimism. Perhaps he is wrong, but the public likes it and likes the man who does it.

Probably the United States, one and severally, will live and grow stronger through any adversity—even excessive babying. So it seems.

Palestine Arabs Call Off Strike

Appeal Of Four Rulers Halts 24 Weeks Of Strife And Business Stagnation

JERUSALEM, Oct. 11.—Tomorrow, the day completing its twenty-fourth week, the Arab strike will end.

Arabs' shops will reopen and their taxis and buses will ply for hire. Today Arab shopkeepers were cleaning and painting their premises in preparation to resume business.

This strike, which has brought the Arab masses in Palestine almost to economic ruin, benefited no one, politically or otherwise, except one Arab politician, Haj Amin el Husseini, Mufti of Jerusalem and president of the Mosiem Supreme Council and of the Arab High Committee. The latter body, organized at the beginning of the present disturbances, is composed of leading Arabs representing all Arab parties in Palestine.

The appeal to Palestine Arabs to call off their strike and restore order came from four leading Arab rulers, although, to be sure, at the instigation of the Palestine Arab High Committee. The proclamation to the masses here, however, while based on the Arab monarchs' appeal, nevertheless was actually a manifesto of the Arab High Committee. Thus in the eyes of the Arab masses Haj Amin el Husseini has become a great national hero by achieving intervention by the Arab kings in Palestine affairs.

Masses Ignorant of Facts

These masses know little of the true state of affairs. They are unaware that all Haj Amin el Husseini's efforts to obtain concessions from the British Government as the price of calling off the strike were in vain or that he failed to persuade the Arab kings that through their intervention the Palestine Government would grant concessions to the Arabs.

The following text of a letter from King Ibn Saud of Saudi Arabia which this writer was able to obtain exclusively is the best proof of how Palestine Arab politicians continue to play on the ignorance of the masses.

I cannot ask the British Government again to make any promises, for I have already done so thrice without result. However, we are ready and willing to assist you in every way possible if you wish to continue your efforts to obtain some concessions from the British.

But I would remind you that persistence in your efforts may have a most harmful effect on your country and people. If you are looking out for the best interests of your country, you will end your struggle against the British, for you must realize continuation of your struggle will only entail considerable losses to you and will ultimately result in your defeat. Such a result, as you well know, would be disastrous not only to Arabs in Palestine but to the entire Arab world.

However, if you are willing to accept an appeal that does not in any way place upon us any restriction, we are ready to issue one immediately. We are sending you an appeal that is for your own good. We advise you to accept.

I repeat, my brothers, that I am ready to help you in every way possible.

This letter was read at a special meeting of the Arab High Committee on Oct. 8 by Sheikh Kamel El Kassab, the special envoy of King Ibn Saud.

So much for the Arab side. As for the mandatory power (Great Britain), its argument that the Palestine Arabs' surrender is unconditional and has settled the situation without martial law may appear infallible on the surface, but the result may be a lowering of British prestige.

The Arab masses have been told by their leaders that the British Government fears the Arabs. As proof they point to the huge British forces now in Palestine and add "Yet the British Government did not dare declare martial law."

The masses are further being told: "You have fought the great British Empire for six months. Now the great Arab kings will take up your struggle."

'Grasshopper Take-Off' Gyro Shows Its Paces In England

English aviation circles recently had their first view of the improved autogyro of June de la Cierva with the "grasshopper take-off" at Hounslow Heath. This craft of Senor Cierva possesses the ability to rise straight in the air without any forward run. Senor Sierva has also called his new autogyro "autodynamic" because of its ability to adjust itself automtically to the conditions of flight.

Hounslow Heath where two of these autogyros were demonstrated is in no sense an airfield but rather rough ground with scattered clumps of furze bushes. The necessity for quick take-off was emphasized when the planes were placed only a few yards from a large patch of furza.

The pilot warmed up his engine and then set the two-bladed windmill revolving above his head. The blades automatically moved to zero pitch when the clutch was engaged, starting the vanes revolving. Then the blades were speeded beyond the normal revolution required for flight. When the clutch was released, disengaging the blades from the motor, the blades assumed a maximum pitch.

This sudden change in pitch produced lift in excess of the weight of the gyro and the aircraft was projected directly into the air about 30 to 40 feet. At this point the plane began forward flight. The spectators watching only a few yards away were left open-mouthed by this simple feat.

During the flight the gyro blades perform the same function as a fixed wing and are driven by the wind. Only the propeller is driven by the engine. The speed of the supporting blades is independent of the flight of the plane and remains substantially constant. After circling about the field, the pilot brought the gyro back to the same spot from which he had risen, settling gently without any forward landing run.

Some of the chief features of the new rotor are stability in gusts and disturbed air conditions, constancy of lift, blade pitch regulation for all forward speeds and altitudes and no tendency to slow down because of ice formation. The rotor has a brake which decreases the blade pitch when the plane alights, removing all tendency to overturn after landing.

The new autogyro is held to be much simpler to control and its ability to rise and descend vertically brings nearer the possibilities of landing the taking off from the roofs of city buildings.

One of Pan American's recent China Clipper flights from Honolulu to Wake Island, by way of Midway, carried two modern "Pied Pipers," naturalists associated with the Hawaii agricultural experiment station, whose jobs it will be to rid both Midway and Wake of rats.

The rats have been unmolested on these coral islands which have been in American possession for 30 years. With the coming of the airways, however, their elimination has been considered important. Of two varieties, red and black, the rats menace the terns, goonies, frigate and other birds of these coral atolls. They have also got into the Pan American colonies.

The problem which these naturalists face is to develop a chemical which will elminate the rats and at the same time be harmless to the birds and the hermit crabs which are the natural scavengers. While the birds nest and lay eggs in the sand, where they fall easy victims to night prowlers, the rats have almost impregnable retreats through holes in the coral formations.

Here is a little story which should hearten anyone who wants to fly in the career of Miss Leucha Warner, English girl. Three years ago an instructor at a flying club dismissed her as "unteachable." He said she would never make an airplane pilot. Miss Warner recently "hung up" a 1000-hour record.

Miss Warner has become such an aviation enthusiast that she keeps three flying suits at different fields and hires airplanes according to her needs of the moment. She flies in all kinds of weather. Frequently when the weather is too bad to do cross-country flying she practices landings in an open machine while other pilots remain indoors. She has often set off for long flights in England in poor weather.

Once when Miss Warner lost her way she was forced to set her machine down in a small field. Later when attempting to take off she found that the plane was not going to clear the trees. Many experienced pilots in this fix would have attempted to pull out over the tree tops and perhaps have stalled into them or gone into a spin by trying to bank too sharply without forward speed. Miss Warner put her plane's nose into the trees, which acted as a shock absorber. She was not hurt and the plane was little damaged.

Glimpses Behind The Menu Card

Extracts from an article in Scientific Monthly, New York (Sept. 1936), by Dr. Roe E. Remington, Professor of Nutrition, Medical College of the State of South Carolina.

It is said that man is the only animal to have acquired such an appetite for salt as to eat it in excess of his daily needs. According to Morse, the normal daily human urinary excretion of salt is half an ounce. Salt was so highly esteemed by the ancients that the wages of Roman soldiers were paid in this commodity, hence the word salarium or salary. Nonetheless, the explorer Stefensson found that the Ekimos, far from using salt, actually have a distaste for it.

Holland, one of the principal dairying countries of the world, imports large quantities of oleomargarine, but sells her butter to England. The market value of what she produces is so high that the producer buys a cheaper substitute for himself. The immigrant farmers in the Dakotas, for the same economic reason, give no milk to their children. Every fresh cow means a calf with future market value. Inevitably most such children grow to maturity with the idea that milk is suitable food for calves and pigs, not for humans, and thus a dietary habit is created.

The idiotic teaching exemplified in the Hay system of diet that certain food combinations, such as meat with bread or potatoes, are harmful when taken together, has been exploded by more than one reputable scientist of recognized standing.

All primitive religions are religions of sacrifice. The authority and superiority of the gods could only be maintained by the insistence that they could accept only the choicest and best. And the parts demanded, in most cases, were the entrails and the blood. This leads us to the conviction that internal organs and blood may have been once highly esteemed as articles of diet. But, their use being proscribed, man came through the centuries, to look upon them as not fit for food. That this modern attitude is not physiologically sound has been borne out by the experience of keepers of zoological museums. Lions and tigers fed only on muscle flesh sicken and die, but if the internal organs of the slaughtered animals are added to the menu, they thrive. The feral beast which, beset by pangs of hunger, brings down a deer, tears open the carcass and disembowels it, disdaining to touch the muscular tissue until all else has been consumed.

Palestine Riots Blamed On Press

leading Jews here strongly advocates that the permanent Mandates Commission of the League of Nations be entrusted with the solution of the Palestine problem in cooperation with the mandatory power. It is suggested that this cooperation could be achieved in the following manner:

First, an opportunity would be given to the mandates commission to examine the policy of the mandatory government before it is finally decided upon by the latter.

Secondly, in order that the mandates commission might get first-hand information on the situation here, it would be permitted to summon representatives of Palestine's population in addition to hearing representatives of the mandatory power and the thirty members of the mandates commission would visit Palestine to get an idea of the atmosphere and study important factors connected with solving the problem.

The members of the mandates commission would be regarded not as enemies of the administration but as mediators whose chief function would be to bring the Arabs and the Jews together.

Such a solution, it is felt, would not only be in the interests of both peoples but would also be entirely to the advantage of the mandatory power, since the decision of the mandates commission would absolve the British Government of all responsibility.

Roosevelt Sends Message To Labor Conference

Domei

WASHINGTON, Nov. 9—In a message addressed to the Third National Conference of Labor Legislation, which opened here today, President Roosevelt declared, "The country last week had given mandate in unmistakable terms to its legislators and executers" to adopt needed labor legislation.

Also present at the conference, Secretary of Labor Frances Perkins, read a message which has committed the Administration to carry through its labor reforms "until the working people nationwide is assured of decent working conditions, including safe healthful places of work, adequate care and support when incapacitated for reason of accident, industrial disease, unemployment or old age and reasonably short working hours, an adequate annual incomes, proper housing and elimination of child labor."

The conference is being attended by Union representatives and by States labor officials.

Communism Losing In Western Europe

In France And In Spain A Weakening Of Moscow's Influence Is Seen

PARIS, Oct. 16.—Events in Western Europe now show clearly that communism is losing ground. After the French elections last May Communists believed they were near the dawn of a world victory. Two months later their hope had become to them a certainty. In three months, they prophesied in Moscow, Spain would be won, and in three years, France. So optimistic were the agents of Moscow that they even spoke their hopes aloud to foreign diplomats.

But what is happening now? In France public manifestations organized by Communists are growing smaller and smaller, and their campaign in Alsace last Sunday proved a complete fiasco. In a good many cases their meetings were so small it was not worth while for opposite camps to stage counter-manifestations. At the last partial election Communist votes in Bordeaux fell off by a third. Several strike orders recently have been disobeyed by workers.

Abroad the Communist balance sheet is even more discouraging. Spanish Nationalists will be in Madrid within a month, and it is known already that the British Government is all set to recognize General Franco's government as soon as it is installed in the capital. All Soviet efforts have proved in vain. These efforts included sending in June last to Barcelona and thence throughout the peninsula their forty best Spanish agents who had graduated in revolutionary technique at the University of Moscow.

Shift in French Opinion

Here in France public opinion can no longer be excited by a fear that defeat for the Communists in Spain will mean the triumph of Fascists, because it is fairly evident that it will be Great Britain and not Italy which will have the biggest influence in the peninsula. Furthermore, slowly but surely the drift of international policy is toward a western pact which will eliminate the Franco-Russian entente.

Recognition of this decline of communism was marked in the speech of the Radical leader, Camille Chautemps, last Sunday. He is one of the most astute political observers in France and the leader of that section of opinion which wants neither fascism nor communism, but the preservation of individual liberty. As Minister of State in Premier Blum's Popular Front government he warned the Rightists that if the Popular Front was broken the Radicals would not side with them, and at the same time warned Communists that they must keep within the Popular Front ranks.

If for one reason or another the Popular Front should be broken, he hinted, a new election would be necessary. That he and his fellow Radicals are prepared to take this step shows clearly that they are confident that they and the Socialists can win back from the Communists a good many of the seats lost in the last election, and that the republic can be liberated from the compromising support of Moscow, it was reported to the New York Times.

There is confidence too that the decline of communism does not mean an increase in Fascist strength. There is instead a growing hope that in the new monetary agreement among the three great democracies, France, Great Britain and the United States, a beginning has been made toward a revival of liberalism and a strengthening, as Ambassador Bullitt expressed it, of those "principles of liberty in a world where many nations have forgotten what it is to be free."

Richard the Lion Hearted

Richard I, King of England, was brought up in his French duchy of Poitou. He only spent a few months in England before his coronation in 1189, and after his coronation spent only a total of 26 weeks in his kingdom. This King of England, who could not speak any English met Berengaria of Navarre in Italy, married her in Cyprus, left her in Acre, Palestine, while he was crusading. She waited for him in France, during Richard's imprisonment, never rejoined him after his liberation, and died in Le Mans, France, in 1230, without ever having set foot on England. Richard was killed by an arrow, while besieging Chalus, France. His body was interred at Fontevrault, while his heart was buried in his beloved Rouen, France.

Pole Climbing Auto

Ralph Pennington had a curious auto accident on highway 281, near Ayr, Nebraska. Travelling at moderate speed on a gravel road, he made a sharp turn, swerved into the left side ditch, then turned sharply to the right and lost control. The car plunged straight across the road, turned a somersault, and came to a stop with the rear bumper caught on the lower cross arm of the telephone pole and all four wheels free of the ground. Pennington, sole occupant of the car, suffered only minor injuries.

Hsinlitun-Yihsien Rail Line Opens To Traffic

Domei

CHINCHOW, Nov. 10—A new railway line connecting Hsinlitun and Yihsien, on the Chinchow-Jehol line, was opened to traffic today. Construction work on the new line, which covers a distance of approximately 120 kilometers, was completed at the end of last month.

The new line is expected to play an important role in economic development of Chinchow Province, notably in connection with the Puhsin coal mine, west of Hsinlitun, and also cultivation of rice-field along the line.

Special importance is attached to the line in view of the fact that the line greatly facilitates the exportation of coal from the Puhsin mine, reducing the distance between the mine and Hulutao Poert down to 200 kilometers. The deposits of the mine are estimated at around 5,000,000,000 tons.

Austria on Alert, Schuschnigg Says

Chancellor Warns Foes At Home And Abroad In Talk To 10,000 Of Fatherland Front

VIENNA, Oct. 17.—On the eve of a great gathering of the Fatherland Front militia, for which some 60,000 persons from all parts of Austria have already arrived here, Chancellor Kurt Schuschnigg delivered tonight at City Hall a speech on his intentions to local leaders of the organization.

These leaders came with hundreds of banners of the Fatherland Front to the illuminated City Hall and nearly 10,000 persons listened to the Chancellor as he outlined the aims of the militia and the program of his government for the coming year.

After having emphasized the "danger" of communism for all civilized countries and the preparedness of his government to check all forms of subversive agitation in Austria, Dr. Schuschnigg announced that Vice Chancellor Eduard Baarenfels had resigned as head of the militia. After having thanked the Vice Chancellor for his efforts as head of this organization the Chancellor announced he had appointed the Governor of Carinthia, General Huelgerth, as commander.

Appraises German Accord

Concerning the accord with Germany, concluded July 11, Dr. Schuschnigg said that no change in Austrian domestic policy had resulted. The agreement must be regarded from the viewpoint of foreign policy, he declared.

The Chancellor said the accord had given Austria unlimited recognition by Germany of her independence and sovereignty and had put an end to agitation from outside Austria. Now the way is open, he said, to sincere cooperation and understanding between the two countries.

Concerning a Hapsburg restoration, Dr. Schuschnigg declared:

"The Patriotic Front (the Fatherland Front) includes monarchists and non-monarchists as well. It does not include those who are attacking the honor of Austria's former dynasty, whose history is connected with the history of the nation itself. Accusations calling the former dynasty traitors and enemies of the German people are malicious statements that no honest Austrian will permit.

"The honor of the family of Hapsburg is that of Austria, but the problem of the form of state is only a secondary one. The State itself is what is important and I myself believe there is no eternal form of State. That depends on the necessities of the moment.

Holds Issue Is Domestic

"The problem of restoration and the form of state, however, is an entirely domestic problem. It cannot depend upon considerations from abroad and cannot be decided by foreign powers or organizations.

"Not even the government or the Patriotic Front itself has the power to solve this extremely important matter. Only the whole Austrian people is entitled to make a free decision about this problem, but the problem itself is not immediate."

News agency reports sent abroad said that the Chancellor had announced he was contemplating a plebiscite on the restoration question, but these apparently arose from a misunderstanding of broadcast portions of the speech, says the N. Y. Times.

Preparations are complete for the great gathering of the militia and hundreds of delegations in picturesque costumes were parading the streets tonight. Among them were the Tyroleans in their native costumes, who won great applause wherever they appeared.

There are rumors of a Nazi attempt to organize counter-demonstrations tomorrow, but the government declares that measures to prevent this have been taken.

YOTSUYA TO HAVE SUBWAY STATION

Permission will shortly be given to the Tokyo High Speed Railway Company by the Railways Department to build a subway between Yotsuya Mitsuke and Akasaka Mitsuke, a distance of 1.4 kilometers. Work will be completed toward the end of next year, and the line will be linked with the Shibuya-Toranomon line which will also be completed at about the same time.

TOKYO STUDYING NORI INDUSTRY

With the forthcoming excavation of the Tokyo-Yokohama canal, the growing of nori, edible seaweed, in the near waters of Tokyo will become impossible. To save the nori growers and their families who number some 50,000, therefore, the Tokyo Prefectural Aquatic Industrial Experimental Station has been studying means to raise the seaweed in the deep waters in the offing of Tokyo Bay for the last several years.

Alberta Is Facing New Bond Default

ment, the restoration of full interest payments to holders of Alberta's bonds, and modification of Alberta's recent legislation reducing debts between individuals, and received loud and enthusiastic cries of "No."

Plan Credit Houses

Encouraged by these demonstrations of support the Premier and his followers have let it be known that by Nov. 15 they plan to establish some twelve "State credit houses" in Edmonton and Northern Alberta constituencies. These credit houses will immediately accept deposits for cash purposes or conversion into Alberta credit; in other words, will seek to replace the banks.

By Dec. 1, it is hoped to begin payment of social credit dividends. The registration of 370,000 citizens for dividend payment indicates that half of Alberta's population is still hopeful that social credit will work.

The first dividends, according to Premier Aberhart's recent statements, will be between $5 and $10 monthly, with increases as Alberta's production increases. The turnover tax with which it is proposed to redeem the payments will, it is understood, not be imposed for the first two or three months, on the theory that purchasing power can be substantially increased before the danger of inflation arises and the tax is levied to prevent it.

The social credit issued will be accepted by Alberta merchants for Alberta goods only, imported goods selling only for currency. The government will re-enforce this stimulus to economic nationalism by lending credit without interest to men willing to manufacture goods now imported.

Meanwhile, $120,000 of the original $236,000 of taxable "prosperity certificates," issued by the government in August, is still in circulation in the Province.

GIVES LECTURES IN SAN FRANCISCO

Mrs Zoe Penlington, formerly of The Japan Times, gave a lecture in San Francisco recently on "Dramatic Gods that Thunder" before the Japan Society and later spoke on "Dance in Japan" at the Adolf Blom Studio.

Mrs. Penlington was for many years the only professional Occidental critic of the Japanese stage. She made a study of the three forms of Japanese drama. She is also the author of "Kabuki, the Popular Stage of Japan," and two new books, one on classical drama and one on the doll theater, both of which are about to be published.

Mrs. Penlington is a graduate of the University of Washington and began her career as a dramatic critic on the Post-Intelligencer.

Schuschnigg Plans Full Dictatorship

Outlawed Heimwehr Makes No Move To Oppose Chancellor And The Clerical Party

VIENNA, Oct. 16.—The stage has been set for the announcement of plans for a single dictatorship by Dr. Schuschnigg's Clerical party without the participation of the Heimwehr.

Dishandment of the Heimwehr was, of course, merely the logical completion of the step taken last May when Prince von Starhemberg was dropped from the Cabinet by Chancellor Schuschnigg at the time the decision was taken to violate the treaty of St. German by instituting conscription and to issue a decree called the Fatherland Front Law, which made that group the only political body sanctioned in Austria and its militia the only armed force, aside from executives, tolerated in the country.

Adds to Portfolios

Dr. Schuschnigg brought all these under his own personal control and has dorpped Egon Berger Waldenegg as Foreign Minister, adding this portfolio to his other post of Minister of War, it was reported to the New York Times.

To consolidate his power, however, it was necessary not only to declare, as he did last May, that the Fatherland Front militia was the only armed force tolerated, but to make it such by dissolving the Heimwehr, which, under Prince von Starhemberg, had refused to re-enter the Fatherland Front militia. Thanks to Major Emil Fey's attacks on Prince von Starhemberg and the latter's preoccupation with private matters and indifference to public affairs, it proved possible to do this more easily and quickly than Dr. Schuschnigg had ever anticipated.

A question which it is not yet possible to answer fully but which every one is asking is: "What will the Heimwehr do?"

Broadly speaking, it is safe to answer, "Nothing." Something, however, has been done already. The writer learns that the provincial Heimwehr last May, as soon as Prince von Starhemberg was expelled from the Cabinet, began secreting arms which they will certainly not surrender. On the other hand, they are not likely to use them unless some unexpected development—much later—offers them the chance to do so to their own advantage.

Aid for Communists

The Communists will receive a slight accession of strength from the disgruntled Heimwehr and the Nazis a very considerable accession, as the organizer of the Tyrol Heimwehr, Hans Schober, did not hesitate to declare at a meeting of Tyrol Heimwehr leaders at Innsbruck this week, despite the presence of political police.

Presumably in some cases certain quantities of arms will be at the disposal of the illegal Nazi movement, but not likely to a dangerous extent. Large numbers of small Heimwehr functionaries, now eking out minute pensions by minor Heimwehr jobs, are likely to become recruits to the Nazi army of the discontented middle class, but Dr. Schuschnigg is confident the army and police are loyal and strong enough to prevent even the beginning of open trouble.

'Mohicans' Reliance Picture At Teigeki

About a year ago, two comparatively youthful and exceedingly ambitious motion picture producers, Harry M. Goetz and Edward Small, dug the old, familiar "Count of Monte Cristo" out of the library shelves and produced it with perfect fidelity for the major screen sensation of the year, making its leading actor, Robert Donat, a screen star of first magnitude and of their company, Reliance Pictures, a new and major force in the industry.

Today this same pair, with a number of screen hits tucked under their belts, are repeating with another familiar classic, "The Last of the Mohicans," by James Fenimore Cooper, which comes to the Imperial Theater today.

What has delighted millions of people in book form, they argue, will delight more millions in a good cinema adaptation. Not every classic, not every popular work, is successful in motion pictures, but certain familiar authors—and they enthusiastically nominate Dumas and Cooper—were natural screen writers, born too soon.

The elements of suspense, hairbreadth escapes, the lone scout battling his way through hordes of savage enemies, the chase, the dramatic hand-to-hand combat—all the elements that make a film a source of never-failing delight to thousands of movie fans—are present in large measure in the Cooper masterpiece.

"The Last of the Mohicans" is a monumental piece of fiction, one of the greatest books ever written in America, translated into a score of languages, with a secure place in world literature. Its chief characters—Hawkeye, Uncas, Magua—are fullblooded characters, familiar and alive. Even the lesser figures, General Montcalm, Colonel Munro, the ancient sachems of the Delaware, were tenderly and carefully depicted by Cooper, master of narrative.

Hence, the story had to be translated into films with the devotion to the original, the careful background and fidelity of character that is demanded in dealing with a familiar classic.

Director George B. Seitz was chosen for the task. The preparation of the script was assigned to Philip Dunne, from an adaptation by John Balderston, Paul Perez and Daniel Moore, and the cast comprises one of the greatest lineups in screen history, headed by Randolph Scott, Binnie Barnes, Henry Wilcoxon, Bruce Cabot, Heather Angel, Phillip Reed, Robert Barrat, Hugh Buckler and Willard Robertson. The film is released through United Artists.

US Navy Personnel Reshuffle Announced

Domei

WASHINGTON, Nov. 10—Announcing a comprehensive personnel reshuffle in the higher command of the United States Navy, President Roosevelt today appointed Admiral William D. Leahy, at present commander of the Battle Force of the U. S. Fleet, to succeed Admiral William H. Standley as Chief of Naval Operations, when the latter retires on January 1, 1937.

Rear-Admiral Claude C. Bloch, now commanding the Battleship Division 2, was elevated to the temporary rank of Admiral and appointed to succeed Admiral Leahy as commander of the Battle Force. Rear-Admiral John W. Greensdale, member of the Navy General Board, was nominated commander of the Battleship Division 2 in succession to Rear-Admiral Bloch.

Rear-Admiral Edward C. Kalbfus, president of the Newport Naval War College, was promoted to the rank of vice-admiral, and named to command the Battleship Division 1, succeeding Vice-Admiral Clarence F. Kempff, who becomes commandant of the Mare Island Navy Yard.

Simultaneously, Brigadier-General Thomas Holcombe was elevated to the rank of Major-general to succeed Major-General John H. Russell as commandant of the United States Marine Corps. The latter retires on December 31.

Soviet Press Mild On US Election

Backs No Candidate, Denies Reds Support Roosevelt, But Twits 'Bourgeois'

MOSCOW, Oct. 16.—Not only do William Randolph Hearst's charges that the American Communist party is really supporting President Roosevelt for the present bring indignant denials here, but there are indications the Kremlin has passed down word to the Soviet press to "soft-pedal" the American election.

Such articles as are printed here weigh the prospects of President Roosevelt and Governor Landon and discuss the background of the election and the influence of the minor parties—and, except for slaps at bourgeois political methods, they do not differ greatly in tone from articles appearing in the British press. They do not advocate the election of any candidate or any party, not even the Communists' own Earl Browder.

But any Soviet article on the campaign is incomplete without an excoriation of Mr. Hearst—or "Mister Gerst," as the Russians, lacking an H in their alphabet, call him—as the originator of the yellow press and the advance agent of fascism. For instance, in an article yesterday the newspaper Izvestia's expert on American affairs, P. Lapinsky, referred to Mr. Hearst's "shameless, nonsensical and sensational inventions, designed always for the dumfounding of backward people who have a weakness for any stupidity," it was reported to the New York Times.

Both Parties Criticized

The general Soviet attitude, as reflected in the Soviet press, certainly shows greater respect for Mr. Roosevelt than for Mr. Landon and sees the Democratic party as more favorable to the common people and to the ideals of liberalism than the Republican party. But both are considered agencies of the bourgeois classes, which in the Soviet lexicon means the exploiting classes. The Democratic party is regarded, however, as the lesser of two evils.

"Both are defending the interests of the existing system," said Mr. Lapinsky. "At the present critical moment the Democratic party headed by Roosevelt is defending these interests probably better than the somewhat obdurate Republican party. The New Deal is more maneuverable and flexible."

An article this week in Trud, organ of the Central Trades Union Council, remarks that unemployment, slow recovery and similar conditions in America are promoting radicalism and causing increasing distrust of both old political parties. This is being reinforced, says Trud, by reactionaries, who are pushing America toward wild reaction and fascism.

Roosevelt Analyzed

The section of the Democratic party headed by Roosevelt has adopted Leftist slogans, advocated regulation of industry and agriculture and has enacted some social legislation to aid the unemployed, it says.

But "Roosevelt has not the least idea of changing the capitalist regime," Trud goes on. "But, being an experienced politician, he understands that concessions to the masses at this stage of American development are necessary if capitalism is to be saved."

Crosby Defeated

Anyone who thinks that chess isn't a child's game can get some inside information on the subject by consulting Bing Crosby.

The King of Croon has learned, to his surprise, much about the subject. He had fancied himself rather a good chess player until he discovered, recently, that thirteen year old Edith Follows can give him a Pawn and a Rook and still beat him.

Informal chess matches between young Miss Follows, and either Madge Evans or Crosby, have become a regular between-the-scenes diversion at Columbia Studios where the trio is engaged in filming "Pennies From Heaven" under the direction of Norman McLeod.

Edith Follows, at the moment, is leading in the marathon chess tournament with Crosby, Miss Evans and Donald Meek tied for second place.

Crosby is anxious to learn who started the rumor that chess isn't a child's game.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

Columbia Signs Beryl Markham

Beryl Markham, first woman flier to make the westward crossing of the Atlantic by air, has succumbed to the blandishments of a news-conscious Hollywood. Aboard the "Queen Mary" on her homeward trip to England, Mrs. Markham signed a contract proffered to her by Jack Cohn, vice-president of the Columbia Pictures Corporation who was also a passenger on the ship.

News that the willowy, blonde flier was to become a movie star was contained in the following radiogram sent from mid-Atlantic by Mr. Cohn to the Columbia home office in New York: "AFTER MUCH PERSUASION FINALLY INDUCED MRS. BERYL MARKHAM TO SIGN CONTRACT APPEAR IN MOTION PICTURES PORTRAYING HER GREAT ACHIEVEMENT FOR COLUMBIA."

It is not known yet whether Mrs. Markham will return to the United States to make the picture in Hollywood or remain in England and make it there.

Mrs. Markham and Mr. Cohn met just before the "Queen Mary" sailed when they were both posing for news photographers on the sun deck of the huge ship.

Reader's Digest Is In Class By Itself; How It Grew Told

With A Staggering Circulation Of 1,801,400 Copies, It Earns Sizable Profit

The remarkable success of the Reader's Digest is told in the following article in the current issue of Fortune:

Prime fact about Reader's Digest is its circulation, never before disclosed. The circulation, as of October, 1936, is 1,801,400 copies, which is the largest ever achieved by a magazine without fiction or pictures; and larger than that of any other magazine costing twenty-five cents a copy, except Hearst's Good Housekeeping (2,155,800). Last year, with a circulation over 1,450,000 producing revenue of $2,178,000, it spent so much money on salaries and other editorial costs that showed a net before taxes of only $418,000—which, however, was the property of just two stockholders—DeWitt Wallace (52 per cent) and Lila Bell Acheson Wallace (48 per cent). It has an editorial staff nearly innocent of previous magazine experience, receiving salaries and bonuses up to $100,000 and more. It not only pays generous fees to thirty-five magazines for exclusive reprint privileges but even supplies certain of the magazines, gratis, with original articles which Reader's Digest proceeds to condense and reprint the following month. And through all its amazing success it clings to the village of Pleasantville, where the wayfarer may pace the streets without ever discovering that a magazine named Reader's Digest exists there.

In the corner office sits DeWitt Wallace ("Wally" to his friends, "DW" on office memos). He is tall, lean, slightly stooped, and he is dressed in the tweedy elegance of the English professor with the private income. He is forty-seven and looks five years younger, although his hair is a bit gray. Generally ill at ease with strangers, he is always shy, soft-voiced, and speaks haltingly. Often he is absent in Manhattan, attending to magazine contracts or transacting editorial business in a publisher's office or over a leisurely scotch and soda in a good hotel bar. But mostly he is here in Pleasantville, running his editorial show, perhaps dispatching crisp memoranda signed DW to KWP, GWF, HAL, REH, and the twenty-odd others who make up his staff.

Beyond doubt it is the most curious editorial staff that ever put out a first-rate magazine. Of its thirty-two members only two had worked on a magazine before, and the others had done everything from selling linoleum to designing houses. Two were onetime clergymen and one was a missionary in India. All of the male editors in Pleasantville except one are married; and all—perhaps because they work in shirt sleeves—wear belts.

Top man of the staff is Managing Editor Kenneth W. Payne who, far from being a novice, had a long journalistic record behind him when he went to Pleasantville in 1930. Grandson of a newspaperman, son of a newspaperwoman, small, wiry Ken Payne studied at the Sorbonne, returned to his Cleveland home to discover that his acquired French mannerisms were not appreciated by his midwestern friends. A year of journalism study at Wisconsin delatinized him, after which he worked for newspaper syndicates, free-lanced, edited Popular Science, was managing editor of old McClure's, and was managing editor of the North American Review when he met DeWitt Wallace. As managing editor of Reader's Digest he edits every shred of copy and greatly pleases Editor Wallace, who considers that they think alike and who even in 1934 paid him the sum of $102,467.

It began in Pittsburgh in 1921 when DeWitt Wallace was fired from the Westinghouse foreign-publicity department—and even before that.

In his mind the idea expanded thus: that a considerable number of people wanted to be well informed, but the vein of worth-while information of lasting interest was buried so deep and spread so thin through the wordy ore of U. S. magazines, no reader could spend the time and money to dig it out every month. Mr. Wallace proposed to do this for them, and to condense the chosen articles into a small, pocket-size magazine. To prove to himself that it could be done, while in the hospital he took scores of magazine articles and cut them to a fraction of their length without spoiling their meaning. But he needed capital and he needed to canvass his prospective readers with the idea.

Things happened in a hurry. Because of the depression, Westinghouse decided practically to wipe out its foreign-publicity staff, and since DeWitt Wallace was the last to be hired, and since there was talk that he had another proposition in mind, he was first to be let out. He went home that night and in cold fury began to write promotion circulars for his magazine scheme. He kept at it for three months. Between times he borrowed money here and there—including $300 from his father and $300 from his brother Benjamin Bruce Wallace, now an expert on international affairs with the U.S. Tariff Commission—until he had $5,000.

At this time he was seeing as much as he could of Lila Bell Acheson, whom he had met when he was a California student. Since their first meeting she had travelled about the country with her Presbyterian minister father and her mother, and was deeply occupied with post-War social service. They became engaged and Lila Bell Acheson became a fully active co-founder, co-editor, and business partner in the Wallace magazine idea.

Thereupon the Wallaces fell to work and in February, 1922, produced the first issue of Reader's Digest, 5,000 copies, twenty-five cents a copy, $3 a year. They thought it would be fine if sometime they could make $5,000 a year.

By 1925 the Wallaces knew precisely what kind of magazine they wanted to publish and had worked out a basic editorial formula that they have followed ever since. In the beginning they had conceived of Reader's Digest as appealing chiefly to women. Their first circulation lists were top-heavy with names of professional women, nurses, etc., and the earliest issues were weighted with articles like "Do Women Dress to Please Men?" and "What Your Mirror Will Tell You About Your Character." They had even window-dressed the masthead with the names of two or three female friends and relatives as editors. That phase lasted only a few months until the Wallaces sighted a broader objective: to make the magazine appeal to an intelligent high-school student and to a college professor. The specific criteria for any article were three: (1) applicability (i.e., the reader should feel that the subject concerns himself), (2) lasting interest (it should be worth reading a year hence), (3) constructiveness. Nothing is taboo except defeatism. Preference is given to stories of good works.

The rightness of the formula was testified to by the fact that the circulation nearly doubled every year. It was 100,000 before Reader's Digest ever was offered on a newsstand. And by that time—1929—Reader's Digest had far outgrown the little-booklet stage and other magazines began to realize they had let something slip up on them. DeWitt Wallace had to leave his editorial seclusion and do business with people who wanted to sell their magazines to as many readers as possible even if they did contain more words than were necessary.

In the beginning the Wallaces helped themselves to their pick of articles from the press, and for the most part other publishers readily gave permission and felt recompensed by the publicity of a credit line. Things went along smoothly and in 1929 Editor Wallace, having tasted prosperity, took himself to Manhattan and nearly gave those same publishers apoplexy by shyly proffering checks in payment for the material he was reprinting. But the evidence of Reader's Digest's success had a disturbing effect, and present Scribner's, taking the stand that the Digest was boring into its circulation, flatly withdrew the right of reprint. Atlantic Monthly and Forum threatened to do likewise, and for a time matters looked bad for Mr. Wallace. But he had a good friend in Kenneth Payne, then with the North American Review, who not only believed in Reader's Digest but was able to help persuade the rebellious editors that the reprint procedure helped them by stimulating. With Mr. Payne's help Mr. Wallace brought the wanderers back into line—and then up popped the imitators.

The imitators, which continue to appear and disappear, aped Reader's Digest's size, format, make-up typography. Their combined circulation was piffling; their editorial quality mostly poor; but by pestering magazines for consent to reprint and by lifting material without even asking, they made themselves such a nuisance that Reader's Digest's status might have been jeopardized along with the rest. It worked out to the Digest's great advantage in the long run. For one thing, the appearance of the first imitator, Fleet's Review, on the newsstands jolted Mr. Wallace into putting Digest on the stands. (He had hesitated for fear it wouldn't sell.) More important, Editor Wallace easily established priority over the imitators and then clinched his position by proposing contracts with the other magazines giving Reader's Digest exclusive right to reprint an article a month. Most publishers signed. (Notable holdouts were Saturday Evening Post and American, which later came in; and the Hearst magazines, which still turn a deaf ear to Mr. Wallace.)

Terms of the contracts varied, but the top price paid by Reader's Digest to the magazines in those days was probably about $100 an article. As the Digest's income fattened, wise Editor Wallace never waited to be asked but voluntarily raised payments; and Manhattan magazine offices are full of stories about how De Witt Wallace came in one day and in his engaging, embarrassed way laid down a check for—say, $3,000, as advance payment on a new three-year contract at a higher rate. Specific contracts are understandably the tighest secret in Reader's Digest business, but there is good evidence that three years ago the top price was $10,000 for three years. And judging from the increase in Digest earnings and Editor Wallace's generous policy of participation, a wise guess might well put the 1936 top at over $30,000. No secret is the fact that in the case of more than one struggling magazine the Digest payments have come to make the difference between red ink and black.

Contracts were well and good, but the episode of the imitators had spotlighted the whole question of reprint magazines. Were they all parasites, and Reader's Digest simply the oldest of the lot? The Wallaces answered by overhauling the Digest editorial formula, keeping the framework but adding original touches of their own. They increased the special departments of fillers, short pieces, compilations of items dug up by Digest's researchers. They added a sixteen-page condensation of a significant nonfiction book. They introduced original articles, conceived in the Reader's Digest office, assigned to outside writers, paid for handsomely (payments now run from $500 to $1,000). But what they did next was probably the most incredible performance in an incredible magazine history.

Long ago the Wallaces had observed that the big magazines with plenty of money to spend spent most of it on fiction; while the "serious" magazines that wanted high-grade nonfiction couldn't get as much of it as they wanted. By now Reader's Digest had the money and talent to produce a hang-up nonfiction article. So Editor Wallace turned around and offered his original articles free to magazines that wanted them. Since the practice began a year and a half ago, some sixty articles have been first printed in a dozen magazines like Scribner's, Forum, Mercury, North American Review, Today, Rotarian. The advantages are multiple. To magazines whose editorial standards are higher than their bank balances, a good article is a large gift. To Reader's Digest, it means cozier relations with the editors. Also it means better reprints from the small circulation magazines. But the only direct reward to Reader's Digest is the right to reprint what it created.

While all those things were going on Reader's Digest's circulation was skyrocketing. Also it was becoming a better magazine and a more complex organism. It grew from the sixty-four-page size to 127 pages. Its typography was improved, and in 1931 its printing was transferred to Concord, New Hampshire, where it became the largest customer of big Rumford Press. Above all, it acquired editorial technique.

Each reader tackles the same thirty or forty magazines every month, carefully examining the articles and grading them on the contents page by a scale reminiscent of school theme marks. A sure bet for reprint is marked "1" (perhaps a "1+" or "1—"). A "2" mark means approximately "I think this is all right but let someone else read it." A "3" means "good subject but not this article." Basest rating is "N. U."—not usuable. The marked magazines are routed to one of two associates, Henderson or Lynch, each of whom captains a team of three readers. The captains also read the marked articles, often readjusting the first reader's estimates and changing "1's" to "3's" or even "N. U.'s" to "1's." The surviving "1's"—sixty or seventy of them—are ordered cut as possible reprints, usually by the reader who spotted them. There is no prescribed space limit to the cutting; the writer is supposed to squeeze it as tight as he can, within the limits of style and color. He does this almost entirely by direct excision. When absolutely necessary a transitional sentence is written in, carefully copying the author's style. (Average reduction is to one-quarter length.) Fifty or sixty of the cuts, when passed by Messrs. Henderson and Lynch, go up to Managing Editor Payne who, with Editor Wallace, selects perhaps twenty-five or thirty for publication. As in the beginning, they still lay emphasis on the uplifting, with the result that the magazine, despite its diversity of contents, often reflects the intense earnestness of its editors.

The chosen articles account for about half the volume of a Reader's Digest issue. Part of the remainder is devoted to the book supplement, the subject of which may be current or may be twenty-five years old. Examples in the past two years: Arnold Bennett's How to Live on Twenty-four Hours a Day, (1910), Norman Archibald's Heaven High—Hell Deep (1935), Clifford Beers's A Mind That Found Itself (1923), Irving Stone's Lust for Life (1934), Book cuts, edited by Maurice T. Ragsdale, are among the most difficult jobs on the magazine, each cut taking a full three weeks before it is ready for final editing. One who cuts books with rare skill is Charles C. May, elderly Manhattan architect who has abandoned his profession to become a Reader's Digest associate and whose last designing job is a large new house for the Wallaces. (Best way to get rid of an importunate applicant for a job: let him try to condense a book.)

Balance of the issue is filled by one or two original articles plus the short stuff—fillers, crisp quotations, one- or two-page compilations of related paragraphs dug up from all conceivable sources on assigned topics. A file of ideas is kept constantly alive by the excerpts editor, and most of the time the Cleveland and New York researchers is devoted to digging up bits on telephone service, curious beauty-shop tricks, good deeds by private citizens, etc.—items that someday, a month or a year hence, may make up a page feature. A regular department entitled "Toward a More Picturesque Speech" presents witty figures contributed by readers at $3 for each one printed. An average of 15,000 quotations a week arrive, mostly quoted from current best sellers. Hardly a day goes by without someone's submitting Hervey Allen's "His face was as yellow and undecided as an omelette" (Anthony Adverse). But the record high is a bit from a Collier's story by George Brooks: "The clock hands were closing like scissors blades on midnight, snipping off another day." Exactly 302 readers sent that one in.

Manchurian Motor Bus

the step. His feet in their wooden sandals made a firm clatter as they struck the ground.

Here and there the road twisted from the hills to the seaside again, and the brilliant blue ocean sent its tonic breeze through the windows of the car. Tiny fishing villages were snuggled in the coves. One was so close to the road that we could see the scaly pattern of the big, rust-red nets drying on the pale sand. A miniature fleet of sampans was drawn up on the beach, including several new ones with the healthy light-brown bloom of fresh wood still bright on their keels. The blue backs of the fishermen leaned over them, and the noisy little red figures of children romped among the scattered shells.

The peasants and fisher-folk of the peninsula are nearly all Chinese. The Japanese, their political and social superiors, live chiefly in the cities and larger towns. The Manchus, whom one would except to be most numerous in Manchuria, we found fewest of all there. Far fewer, indeed, than in Peking; but, after all, it must be recalled that the population of Manchuria emigrated by many thousands to the capital when the Manchu dynasty conquered the throne of Cathay. And so it was a panorama of Chinese faces and huts, of Chinese tea-shops and shrines, which we saw in greatest numbers along the way.

Real temples were few. But there was one—a small structure, not much larger than a big shrine, but still a temple—which stood out with especial drama. The road had swung around a wooden ridge, and suddenly came upon a sharply curving bay. On its opposite shore a fishing village made a quaint picture of huts wreathed in periwinkle smoke, with the tall masts and tipped-up prows of the sampans at anchor in front of it. Above us loomed a green hill which dropped off sheerly in a cliff of copper-red soil. On top of it stood the little temple. Its roof was curved with an emphasis unusual in so small a building—with a taut half-circle like a strung bow. And over its eaves there leaned an ancient pine of strangely beautiful shape. The two, the temple and the pine, stood together, alone against the sky, like a pair of old friends—which indeed they had probably been, each from its beginning.

Onward, around the coves and the ridges, sped our trim motorbus. The traditional slowness of the East was by no means typified by the pace of our driver. He spun us along dizzily, but efficiently, on our way. Soon another little post office appeared in front of us, and our brakes ground to a stop. The chauffeur reached behind him for the rural mail sack; but no one came to take it. He honked his horn. He tooted again and again and again. Finally, from a back door, there emerged a stout old Japanese woman, who waddled out with a cooking-pot in her hand. She took the mail bag from the driver, bowed, and waddled back to her kitchen. Then our bus drove smartly on along the road to Dairen.

At length the scenes of the country gave way to the clutter of the suburbs. There were not so many carts along the road: the carts of Manchuria, with their two big wheels behind and their two small ones in front. There were fewer farmers riding to the next village on their red-tasseled donkeys. Instead, tram cars rattled along the pavement with an ugly clanging. A golf course appeared—beautiful, but artificial. Then the regimented western-style houses and buildings ushered us into the city.

Little Giant

John Baconthorpe of England applied himself to master every field of learning available at the time. He wrote with equal mastery about theology, philosophy, astronomy, astrology, botany, zoology and numerous other subjects. He was a very prolific writer, leaving a record of at least 120 large volumes. He was only 3 feet 2 inches tall, a real dwarf physically. A few of the little giant's volumes usually sufficed to "bury" the master twice over even when he stood on tiptoes. His pupils often diverted themselves in making the teacher "vanish" in the midst of his own works.

Baconthorpe died in 1346, one of the greatest English scholars of all time.

Pope Reported Suffering From Bright's Disease

Domei

VATICAN CITY, Nov. 12—Pope Pius XI is suffering from Bright's disease or dropsy, members of the Pope's household admitted here today. They indicated that the condition of his kidney is causing concern and that both his face and legs have swollen.

It is reported, however, that the Pope, despite his disease, insists upon following his daily routine and refuses to curtail audiences.

A most reliable source revealed that the Vatican police have been instructed to close all the Vatican gates, when given a signal, and to refuse all entry and exit, until further orders.

No explanations were given in this respect but it is understood that the reported arrangements have been made in anticipation for possible death of the Supreme Pontiff.

PLANS FOR HOSPITAL GARDEN FUND

The Ladies Auxiliary Committee of the Yokohama General Hospital at an informal meeting some time ago discussed plans to create a garden fund for the new hospital. A committee consisting of Mrs. B. R. Berrick, chairman, Mrs. H. Lefebvre, treasurer, Mrs. E. R. Hill, secretary, Mrs. M. Fitzgerald and Mrs. H. Spicer was formed to work out a scheme which would give the ladies of the community an opportunity to identify themselves with the splendid work which has already been accomplished in providing a new building for the hospital.

A garden plan was submitted by one of the local nurseries, estimates for the work obtained, and on November 10 the chairman, Mrs. B. R. Berrick, called a meeting at her residence to discuss the scheme publicly and to call for volunteers to carry on the work necessary in raising the funds.

A large group attended the meeting and it was enthusiastically agreed by all present that fine grounds surrounding the hospital should be laid out according to the plans submitted which provide an attractive setting for the hospital as well as a garden where patients may find rest and recreation. Plans for raising the funds required were then discussed and formulated.

Entertainments of various sorts will be given during the coming winter and spring, among which will be a hospital ball, bridge and mahjong tournaments, and a children's play. Mrs. John Sample will be chairman of a committee to arrange the Ball, Mrs. T. G. Ely, Mrs. A. A. Stewart and Miss M. Russell will arrange the tournaments and Mrs. D. G. Daubeny will put on a children's play. Mrs. M. Mendelson and Mrs. L. Lovely will share the responsibilities of press reports and publicity for these occasions.

As an initial step in raising money for the garden fund the committee request the ladies of Yokohama to give their support to a scheme to purchase flower tokens for the numerous occasions which necessitate a gift of flowers. The tokens are attractive cards to be sent in lieu of flowers, the money paid for them going to the hospital garden fund in the name of the recipient. In addition the committee is offering Christmas cards to be used in the same way. The flower tokens and the Christmas cards may be obtained from Mrs. B. R. Berrick, Mrs. P. B. Brown, Mrs. H. Lefebvre, Miss M. Russell and Mrs. H. Spicer.

DRAMATICAL PERFORMANCE OF THE GAIGO

Last Saturday and Sunday, the students of the Tokyo School of Foreign Languages held their annual dramatic performances at the school. The performances started at 1 p.m. each day, under the direction of the instructors of the school. There were Chinese, English, Spanish, French and German plays in these five different languages which were warmly appluaded by all.

The students of the upper class of the French group performed "Les Preciseuses ridicules" by Moliere under the direction of Professor Noel Nouet of the school. The performance had much of expression of the classic play and their dialogues were well interpreted. The background and the interior decoration of the stage as well as the costume arrangements were artistic.

was wise to avoid during the Ethiopian affair. The second naval conference brought out Japan's differences with other powers and made it plain that she considered Great Britain and the United States to be naval allies, even if it was not in writing. The Montreux and other conferences, intended to prevent war by contract, have been equally successful in making dissension. The League, before and especially since the U. S. S. R. was taken into the fold, has served chiefly to accentuate international animosities.

So, perhaps, Germany is right.

Rome and Berlin

In what way can any great power make a mutually advantageous military treaty with Germany today? Some recently led the world to believe that Italy could, but as far as can be learned the conflicting aspirations of the two countries remain unchanged.

The rivalry over the Brenner remains. Mussolini is not committed to the flamboyant anti-Moscow crusade promulgated at Nuremberg. Some agreement was reached—which will not be announced—in regard to Spain. It is important for both countries, and the rest of Europe for that matter, to be assured that the Dictatorship of the Proletariat will not gain a firm foothold in the Iberian penninsula. Other than this expediency, and a sort of tactical collaboration produced by the current confusion in European affairs, Italy and Germany are not closely associated. The understanding between them depends for its intimacy and its duration upon unforeseen developments. To assess it any higher would be as false as to underrate its immediate importance.

The association does, however, bring recent German and Italian catch-lines into relief. Herr Hess created "guns come before butter" and stopped the butter. Recently the Duce contributed "a forest of 8,000,000 well sharpened bayonets" as off-shoots of an "live branch." Neither is very reassuring, unless what Europe needs today is a show of force and a pretended willingness to fight. Peace-talkers have not prevented the long-heralded European conflagration. Unreadiness for war has done it. Perhaps a lot of bluffing has helped. It sometimes does.

Britain To Check Mosley Fascists

lead to social disaster and political chaos."

Lists Points at Issue

Mr. Morrison added that the special points that victims of Mosleyism wanted to take up with the Home Office and Cabinet were:

"That the Secretary of State and chief officers of the police should have the power to divert or deal with processions and street demonstrations that are of such character that they are likely to lead to civil disorder or racial strife; that military uniforms and quasi-military training should be prohibited in connection with political parties, as they are a menace to social peace and inconsistent with the civil character of British political traditions; that the police practice of taking records of speeches made at meetings with a view to subsequent legal proceedings—a practice which has been common in regard to Socialist and Communist meetings—should also be applied to Fascist meetings."

Soviet Russia Prepares For Future Emergencies

remains the Franco-Soviet pact, and it may reasonably be supposed that the prime object of his Nuremberg outburst and, for that matter, of his policy in general, was to weaken the pact and, if possible, bring about its denunciation by France.

Seen in this light his attacks on the U.S.S.R. served a doubit purpose; first, to influence the already strong body of French opinion which opposes the pact with the Soviet; second, to put in the minds not only of the French and British people but of the rest of the world the idea that the war he is preparing against the U.S.S.R. is not a war of revenge but a crusade against Antichrist, in which Germany will pose as the champion of civilization against barbarism and chaos.

Events in Spain gave a wonderful opportunity for Hitler's attempt to replace the true and unwelcome causes of his war by a more popular ostensible cause. He had not forgotten the effects of world public opinion upon Germany's cause in the years 1914-18, and he was not slow to see that events in Spain had given him a good talking point to buttress his pet theory that democracy (i. e the French Popular Front or the Spanish Frente Popular) was the channel through which Bolshevik poison was being disseminated with fatal effect.

Here, then, lie the true causes of German-Soviet antagonism.

Soviet antagonism toward Germany had never really existed—at least not since German collapse on the Western front automatically canceled the Treaty of Bresti-Litovsk—but it certainly exists today. From top to bottom the whole Soviet nation is now convinced that Germany is its enemy, only awaiting a favorable moment to attack it.

German insults and invectives have cut deep into the new pride of the Russian people in its "Soviet Fatherland." German diplomatic activities and anti-Soviet propaganda in a dozen countries, not forgetting Japan, have caused savage rancor, and the immense expansion of Germany's military establishment has made necessary a similar effort by the U.S.S.R. at a time when it was just beginning to reap some reward from its struggle for industrial development.

Sharp Barriers

The most tragic feature of the antagonism is that it appears so factitious and unnecessary, except in so far as it corresponds to the will of Hitler, which dominates the will of Germany. It may perhaps be thought that the great psychological difference betwen Slav and Teuton puts between them a barrier more studied with sharp points than the barrier of race itself. Th. is sheer nonsense; neither individuals nor nations are held apart by psychological differences. Color is a barrier and race sometimes, and sometimes religion, but psychological differences are more often a source of mutual attraction.

Much has been said and written of old racial hatreds in Europe, but I question whether they are so truly racial in origin as based upon the memories of ancient wrongs. Thus, it is not that French and German are mutually antagonistic, like cat and dog, but that Frenchmen have inflicted such harm and damage in the past upon Germans and Germans upon Frenchmen that each of them absorbs hostility to the other with his mother's milk.

Between Russia and Germany there is no such tale of bygone injuries; with the exception of the World War the two countries have been mutually friendly and useful. Prior to 1914 German business men and managers, German machines and German methods were at a premium in Russia.

In this respect Germany has what Russia needs, and Russia can offer Germany not only the raw materials which Germany lacks but an unrivaled market for German industrial production. Far from being antagonistic, the two countries should be complementary, and with that brief exception of the war have been so and would be so today were it not for Hitler's envious eyes upon the Ukraine and his fanatic determination to make use of its wealth to give Germany the mastery of Europe, that "place in the sun" of which the Kaiser dreamed when he invaded Belgium in 1914.

Antagonism Exists

There remains a theory to explain Soviet-German enmity, which, far-fetched as it may sound, I have heard advanced by European observers whose opinions I respect. It is that both bolshevism and nazism are in fact, though not in name, new and militant religions, fighting like the Lion and the Unicorn for the crown of human allegiance.

It is certainly remarkable that, whereas the Bolsheviks had practical and political reasons to detest the Orthodox Church as a pillar of the Czarist system, nazism, which had no such reasons, has shown a decided tendency to restrict and repress the activities of Protestants and Catholics alike, while its extremist wing has frankly advocated the worship of new deities, or rather a reversion to the old gods of "100-per-cent-Aryan" Germany, Thor and Wotan. According to this thesis the fact that there is considerable similarity, at least superficially, between the two creeds would account for much of their antagonism.

Such similarity undoubtedly exists, although I believe that it is more superficial than real. On the face of it, bolshevism and nazism, whether one calls them creeds or political theories, agree in making the individual utterly subordinate to the State and the State's service. They agree in believing that they have found a new and better freedom than our democratic system by removing from the mass of the people the worry and burden of politics and by replacing in their minds any doubt or anxiety about persons or policies with a childlike belief in a single dogma which cannot be questioned and must infallibly be right.

Furthermore, both bolshevism and nazism are highly militarized and disciplined organisms with a strong proselyting urge which is never slow to find expression.

'As You Like It'

By G. CAIGER

So many people have asked me about the forthcoming production of "As You Like It." "Why do a Shakespearean play at all?" they say. Well, partly as a change from the succession of modern plays and particularly because it is such excellent experience for the members of the Dramatic Club. Then, too, the club is rather inclined to appeal to a limited audience and it is hoped that numbers of Japanese will take the opportunity of seeing a play by the world's greatest dramatist. Which brings me to another question—"Why is it being staged at Waseda?"

Not only does the Waseda Okuma Auditorium seat nearly 2,000 people, but through the devotion of Dr. Shoyo Tsubouchi and other scholars the university boasts the unique model of an Elizabethan theater. Choice of the Waseda auditorium therefore would seem a very pleasant recognition of this interest in the great English dramatist.

The answer to another question, "Why As You Like It?" is also easy. This sparkling romantic comedy lies within the scope of amateur players and is more generally attractive than one of the tragedies. So many of Shakespeare's plays offer serious problems of staging, but, after the first act, the Forest of Arden remains the scene of the action. The story develops so naturally and reflects no political significance: the dialogue is easy: the play is full of poetry and the famous songs contribute to its universal appeal.

There are still some seats to be had from the Play Guide in the Ginza—¥1 unreserved and ¥2 reserved, but I would urge people not to leave it any later as the production promises to be one of the most spectacular and successful that the A.D.C. has produced of recent years.

Mr. Forest Garnett created the ballet which ends the play. Following the mood and spirit of the quiet accompaniment the six shepherdesses form a graceful and attractive picture.

The dresses, which have been in the capable hands of a committee composed of Mrs. Dodds, Mrs. Davies and Mrs. Tait, are resplendent with velvet and satin. Rosalind in ruby with gold trimmings and Celia in a delightful shade of blue. The research involved in reproducing the Elizabethan costumes with their doublets and hose, daggers and special crooks, spears, etc., the wigs of clubbed hair, has made great calls on their time and industry. In this work and particularly in the designing, they were assisted by Miss Adrianne Moore.

BACH MUSIC CONCERT

The Tokyo Oratorio Society will play the "Weihnachts" noted oratorio of Bach at its recital at the Y. M. C. A. Hall, Kanda, at 7 p.m. December 4. The performance will be given under the direction of Mr. S. Tsugawa. Mr. Toyohiko Kagawa will lecture on "Bach and Schweitzer" at the recital. Miss Yoshiko Nakamura, soprano; Miss Tokiko Kumazawa, alto; and Messrs. Ryozo Okuda and Takeo Ito will be the soloists. The Vocal Four Chorus and the members of the Tokyo Oratorio Society will give the performance, Mr. Saburo Tabe will assist at the piano.

Clipper Is Back At S.F. From Press Odyssey

glimpses of the dark ocean below.

On this hop the twenty-six-ton Wasp-motored Martin flying boat's passenger list consisted of William W. Chaplin, Universal Service-International News correspondent; Harry W. Frantz, of The United Press; Charles E. Harner, of The Associated Press; Lauren D. Lyman of "The New York Times," and North American Newspaper Alliance; William I. Van Dusen, of Pan American Airways, and C. B. Allen, of the New York Herald Tribune and New York Herald Tribune Newspaper Syndicate.

The Clipper's crew was made up of Captain Dahlstrom, First Officer Francis Scott Key Lewis, Second Officer-Navigator George B. King, Third Officer F. M. Briggs, Engineer Officer Theron E. Grin, Radio Officer Z. L. Wenkstern, and Flight Steward Lawrence W. Hancock.

These thirteen men were the only persons to make the complete round-trip trans-Pacific flight.

Reaches Midway Island

After a day and a night at Pearl Harbor, the China Clipper took off at dawn October 9 for the 1,380-mile flight to Midway Island, which was reached in 9 hours 52 minutes.

On this leg of the trans-oceanic airway and for the remainder of the trailblazing flight until she once again settled on the waters of Pearl Harbor, the clipper carried as additional passengers, John Williams, correspondent-photographer of "The Honolulu Star Bulletin"; Fred Green, of "The Honolulu Advertiser." and Earl M. Welty, of The Pan Pacific Press Bureau.

Taking off at daybreak from Midway on October 10, the Clipper, dubbed by now the "flying press box," crossed the International Date Line on its 1,252-mile flight to Wake Island, losing a whole day in the flash of a propeller blade so that it landed on Sunday afternoon, despite a Saturday morning take-off and only eight hours and forty-one minutes of flying.

At Wake the plane experienced its first delay, a two-day lay-over while it waited vainly for the typhoon-bound Hawaii Clipper to clear Manila in its scheduled mail flight back to California.

Meets Hawaii Clipper

Finally the Clipper took off from Wake at dawn, October 14, completing the 1,560-mile flight to Guam in 9 hours 52 minutes. Here it met the belated Hawaii Clipper carrying Mr. Ekins.

Next morning the two Clippers took off in opposite directions, but the westbound press flyers ran into a typhoon approximately 400 miles at sea and were forced to return to Guam after five hours twenty-nine minutes in the air. The China Clipper continued stormbound the following day, taking off on October 17 for the 1,598-mile flight to Manila, which it completed without incident, save for two hours of thick weather flying at low altitude, in 11 hours 38 minutes.

Two days were passed in the Philippines, the ocean-flying correspondents being treated to a busy entertainment program which included a luncheon with President Manuel L. Quezon, while mechanics prepared the Clipper for her 8,200-mile return flight to San Francisco. In Manila the press flyers were joined by Miss Kilgallen and Mr. Kieran.

The homeward trip started at daybreak October 20 and was made without a single hitch in the five days normally required for the trans-Pacific flight. Travelling against the sun and bucking headwinds involved more hours in the air and necessitated night landings both at Guam and Wake Island.

The Clipper's eastward log shows that the flight from Manila to Guam required 12 hours 22 minutes, Guam to Wake 12 hours 11 minutes, Wake to Midway 9 hours 25 minutes, Midway to Honolulu 9 hours 42 minutes and Honolulu to San Francisco 21 hours 31 minutes.

The entire flight of 16,400 miles was accomplished with no hint of mechanical defect in either the airplane or its four 950-horsepower air-cooled twin-row radial Pratt and Whitney engines, a performance attributed both to the dependability of modern American planes and power plants and to the fact that Pan American's operating technique demands only about half the rated horsepower of its trans-Pacific engines.

The nursing along of the motors upon which the Clippers depend to take them safely across the world's largest ocean is held by officials of the system virtually to obviate the possibility of engine failure. Besides, the Clippers have demonstrated their ability to continue flight with full load on any three of their four engines and to remain aloft on any two after jettisoning part of their heavy fuel load.

College Graduates In China Facing Problem

former years, he added. It can be explained that jobs are scarcer for those who have not received college education and because of the acute unemployment situation middle graduates are forced to idle, hence they flock to colleges. The same situation is said to be found in the United States with the total enrollment of college students much higher now than a few years ago. In China the oft-repeated "newsboy-to-president" stories are seldom heard and it is the general opinion that college-breds have better chances than non-collegians.

It is not always the abler graduates who get the first call for employment, according to this official. Some of the best students who took honors in studies in student days bite their fingernails in their homes without jobs while many of the "just-managed-to-graduate" grads, through influence and "pull," are able to land good jobs. Especially in some of the civic institutions where party and family tradition is given due attention, it is almost impossible for those who cannot produce letters of recommendation from prominent "uncles" to get employment as in most any other country, jobs must be bought with influence and authority in China.

Schools Try to Help

There was a time when the Alma Maters of graduates were able to procure employment through contacts with outside institutions and firms. Even now some of the schools once in a while pick up jobs for grads, but such cases are very rare now. In the technical field, there is an easier outlet, as many technical men are needed in China's program of rehabilitation and reconstruction.

Although educationists claim that the aim of higher education is toward liberalism and broadening of mind, and knowledge and truth, in recent years the favored lines of the freshmen who enter college are engineering, business administration, banking, natural sciences and other vocational subjects, as specializing in such lines is lucrative to the students after their graduation, he continued. Decreased enrollment in arts and literature is reported by nearly all colleges.

Caught in this mad maelstrom of world-wide depression and national crisis, the vast mass of unemployed college graduates in China face a dark period, but it is thought by the Ministry that before long the general outlook for them will brighten up, for the percentage of illiteracy is still too great in China to force the collegians to go jobless forever. Young college graduates with education, courage and initiative will be sorely needed for the upbuilding and re-awakening China in time to come.

Surgery Attacked In Maternity Toll

Caesarian Operations Demand More Conservatism, Congress At Philadelphia Is Told

One of the important factors which keeps the present maternal mortality rate in the United States higher than that in any other country is the lack of conservatism in performing Caesarian operations, the annual clinical congress of the American College of Surgeons was told at Philadelphia on October 20 by Dr. Frank W. Lynch of San Francisco, says the New York Times.

Dr. Lynch's conclusions, based on statistics, were concurred in by two other physicians who discussed his paper—Dr. P. Brooke Bland and Dr. Edward A. Schumann, both of Philadelphia.

"The incidence of Caesarian section in mortality studies," Dr. Lynch stated, "rose from 11 per cent in 1927 to 33 per cent in 1934. Caesarian section preceded 11 per cent of all puerperal deaths in or after the seventh month of pregnancy in the fifteen States for which statistics were published during 1927 and 1928.

"Physicians with neither special training in obstetrics or in general surgery undertake Caesarian section without full consciousness of the threat that their surgery entails.

"They choose the classical Caesarian because it seems simplest to perform. Yet the classical Caesarian section is, and always must be, one of the most illogical of surgical procedures—one which infection can readily break down."

A Treatment for Bronchiectasis

A new type of treatment for bronchiectasis, an infection of the bronchial tubes for which no cure exists, was outlined at one of the clinics at Philadelphia General Hospital by Dr. William F. Moore, associate Professor of Bronchoscopy at the University of Pennsylvania Medical School.

Favorable results, Dr. Moore stated, have been obtained in twenty-one out of twenty-eight cases treated, by the introduction into the infected areas, by means of a bronchoscope, of a polyvalent staphylococcus bacteriophage. A bacteriophage is a germ which eats other germs.

Of the twenty-one cases, Dr. Moore reported, nineteen were "materially improved" and returned to work and two were completely relieved. Five failed to improve and two died of other causes.

The treatment, Dr. Moore stated, is generally given once a week, sometimes for a year or longer. Vaccines are also administered with the treatment.

"With this series of cases as a background," Dr. Moore stated, "we feel greatly encouraged to carry on the research."

A new operation for mending fractures of the thigh bone, using a nail or pin to join together the two broken parts and eliminating the plaster cast, was described by Dr. M. N. Smith-Peterson of Massachusetts General Hospital, Boston.

The operation, Dr. Smith-Peterson reported, has resulted in patients being dismissed from the hospital fit to go back to work, in from four to five weeks, whereas the plaster cast method requires hospitalization for months.

Dr. Stanley P. Reimann, director of the Lankenau Hospital Research Institute, discussed the part played by hormones, substances secreted by the glands, in the causation of cancer. Evidence available so far, he reported, points to the conclusion that "cancers produce hormones but hormones do not directly produce cancer."

Gifts to Hospitals Urged

Robert Jolly of Houston, Texas, in an address before the Hospital Standardization Conference on whether voluntary hospitals shall be continued, suggested that attorneys be asked to advise their clients to make gifts to the hospitals and thus save money in taxes.

"The great task now facing voluntary hospitals," Mr. Jolly said, "is to press the matter of gifts and endowments.

"It is true that they have decreased sickeningly in the last five years, but there are thousands and millions of dollars yet that people have not given away, but are wondering where to give them to the best advantage.

"Clients are asking their attorneys to recommend gifts. We should put our case before the attorneys of our communities. Remember, too, we are growing a new crop of rich. Men of wealth are going to have to give to government, in some instances, as much as 79 per cent of their wealth. Their attorneys can show them how they can actually save money by giving liberally to hospitals.

"Many can save money by establishing annuities and put their money to work where they can see it doing great good, rather than letting the government take it in taxes to spend it, often where the taxpayer does not approve."

In his address, Dr. Lynch said every mortality study shows "that from 60 to 80 per cent of all Caesarean section were of the classical type in spite of the proved fact that the low segment type of operation is much safer as routine."

"Yet," he continued, "the Saenger method is reported to have been used innumerable times in the face of potential infection, after many examinations and even after ineffectual attempts to deliver normally.

"The contra-indication to the classical Caesarian in these tyep of cases has been established for nearly thirty years.

"On the other hand, the surgical mortality is becoming less and less in other gynecological surgery with improvement in technique and better selection of cases.

"In women of the United States, the deaths following Caesarian section approximate one-fourth of the maternal deaths from all causes after the seventh month of pregnancy. The death rate from Caesarian section in this series is one-third that from all causes at any period of pregnancy for women of Sweden, Norway, Italy or Japan.

"There is an ever-growing list of Caesarian sections performed for no obstetrical indications. Thus I find reported cases 'on demand of the patient,' 'wish of the family doctor,' 'economic reasons,' as well as many cases in whom the desire for sterilization entered prominently into the indications.

"We are all offenders on this last count, and the list is growing daily, yet when sterilization is indicated it may be produced more safely on another occasion. Multiple operations must add danger to Caesarian sections, just as they do to all other major surgical operations."

In discussing Dr. Lynch's paper, Dr. Bland said:

"Of all the major obstetric operations Caesarian section is infinitely the most grave. If it were generally realized that the operation is the most serious surgical procedure performed within the abdomino-pelvic cavity, there probably would be no occasion to plead for 'more conservatism.'

"The chief factor, I think, conspiring to thwart a conservative attitude regarding the operation is its apparent technical simplicity, and for the unwary herein lies a grave delusion and snare. This misconception has not only led to its unduly frequent and unwarranted performance but to its performance by those unable to apprehend its true indications and inept in its technique.

"One may safely assert there are too many obstetricians doing obstetrical surgery who are not surgeons. Similarly there are too many surgeons doing obstetric surgery who are not obstetricians, and further there are far too many men and women doing obstetric surgery who are neither obstetricians nor surgeons.

Greek Royalty Witnesses Exhumation Ceremonies

Domei

FLORENCE, Italy, Nov. 14—Crown Prince Paul and Princess Irene of Greece today attended the exhumation ceremonies of the remains of the late King Constantine and Queen Sophia Olga of Greece. Military members of the Royal Household of Italy as well as prominent members of the local church were present at the rites.

A special train bearing the remains of the late King and Queen left for Brindisi where they will be placed aboard the Greek cruiser Averoff and returned to Athens.

'The Great Ziegfeld' Tribute To 35 Stars

sign. Sophie Tucker, Sora Bayes and Jack Norworth have dressing room doors dedicated to them.

A complete dress rehearsal, similar to the famous Ziegfeld night-before-the-premiere presentations, was accorded each musical number in "The Great Ziegfeld."

Not only did the set was always lighted in the proper manner; the cameras were without film in the magazines when Director Leonard put the principals through their paces.

This system, according to Hunt Stromberg, was one of the reasons that the late showman had such flawless presentations for many years. Ziegfeld used these "premiere rehearsals" to insure smoothness and gracefulness in his shows, and for that reason it was decided to use it all the way through the new Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer picture.

The first routine to be treated in this manner was the "Bouquet" number done to the tune of "You've Gota Pull Strings," the setting of which is an exact replica of the former "Ziegfeld Roof" in New York. The number features the "American Beauties," who are considered the outstanding show girls of the country and who were secured after a half year of nationwide searching. A number of dancing girls, under the direction of Seymour Feil; former Ziegfeld aide, also participated in the sequence.

Dr. Dodds Sees Need For Less Specialization

Believes New Discoveries Will Be Made In Zone Between Departments

PRINCETON, N. J., Oct. 24.—"It is incumbent upon science and learning to develop an attack upon the interstices between the organized departments of scholarship," Dr. Harold W. Dodds, president of Princeton University, declared in his annual report to the board of trustees, made here today.

Pointing out that "the course of scholarship of the past generation has been in the direction of greater and greater specialization," Dr. Dodds said that "the significant discoveries of the next generation will be in the twilight zone between the recognized compartments of scholarship today."

By the process of specialization "new techniques have been developed and fresh knowledge revealed which would have been impossible otherwise," but this searching after minute detail "has outrun our power of integrating the findings of scholarship and applying them to human needs," he maintains. If the attack on the "no man's areas of knowledge" is to succeed, "universities must strive to surmount departmental boundaries and consciously encourage young men to think comprehensively."

Cites Steps Taken at Princeton

Princeton University, he reports, has taken "certain modest steps" to reestablish "the unity of the various disciplines by modifications in her system of instruction to permit individual programs of study to cross departmental lines and by cooperation between departments on problems of research," says the New York Herald Tribune.

As an example, he cites the "fruitful scholarship which has given Princeton an eminent place in the scientific world" resulting from the decision of the departments of science ten years ago "to explore cooperatively the borderlines of their respective fields." In the social sciences and humanities there has been a similar trend toward transcending departmental boundaries.

Having obtained through its upper-class plan of study the advantages inherent in a degree of specialization, Princeton in recent years has been giving its capable students an opportunity to benefit from more comprehensive programs, he reports.

"An essential idea behind the program of the School of Public and International Affairs," he points out, "is that no public problem is one of history or of economics or of politics alone. Rather does it involve all three. As a consequence, the school has sought to make it possible for a student to work in broader area than a single department affords. The existence of the school likewise tends to bring the facilities of these three departments into closer contact with one another."

Cast from the same mold as the school is the new divisional program of humanistic studies which Dr. Dodds terms "the most ambitious of our recent efforts to cut across departmental fields of learning" and which is designed "to intergrate several aspects of humanistic study in order that the student may come to understand the interrelation of cultural ideas and historical manfestations."

Interdepartmental Cooperation

Among other examples of interdepartmental cooperation, Dr. Dodds cites the joint development by mathematicians and economists of courses in statistical methods and an interrelation between the historians and classicists in directing the study of ancient civilization.

Discussing the success of Princeton's academic program, Dr. Dodds points to the close relations which exist between faculty member and undergraduate.

"Because of our limited size and peculiar organization," he reports, "Princeton undergraduates have an unusual opportunity to avail themselves of the advantages offered by a distinguished university faculty. Lacking the customary graduate professional schools, our attention is concentrated on the liberal arts and sciences under one faculty which teaches graduate students, upperclassmen and fishmen alike. I know of no university of first rank whose best scholars give as much time to undergraduates as they do at Princeton."

'Porgy' American Negro Drama At Yurakuza

On what grounds did the producer put on this play? He certainly could not have thought that the Japanese audience would enjoy it. The average Japanese knows nothing of the Negro life nor their background. Their songs and legends, expressed in their own lingo, are entirely foreign to the Japanese ear.

From the technical standpoint, the Japanese stage seems entirely too large for the production of a play of this type. The future architect may be able to design a stage which will be suitable for both the Kabuki and modern dramas.

The other two shows of the evening are "Economics of A Young Wife," a one-act comedy and "Kutsukake Tokijiro," a sword and cloak Kabuki drama.—[Montage]

Dogs Make Debut

Two newcomers to pictures, one five years old and the other two, and weighing a total of 268 pounds, are to be seen on the screen soon in one of Hollywood's most important productions.

The screen novices are St. Bernard dogs named Tom and Jerry, owned by Ronnie Renfro, well-known trainer of motion picture dogs, and are making their movie debut in Frank Capra's Columbia production, "Lost Horizon", to be released shortly with Ronald Colman heading a strong cast.

The massive canines, weighing 140 and 128 respectively, have a daily menu which could not, by any stretch of the imagination, be termed modest. They daily consume 12 pounds of hamburger and three pounds of dog biscuits. Each is fed a quart of milk and four eggs daily, in addition, in order to keep the coat shiny and glossy.

Frederick P. Ott, Earliest Actor In Films, Dies

Posed For Thomas Edison As Latter Took First Motion Pictures In History

Frederick P. Ott, the first motion picture actor in America, died on October 24 at his home, 25 Shepard Terrace, West Orange. He was seventy-six years old.

Forty-seven years ago Mr. Ott posed, jumped up and down and sneezed while Thomas A. Edison, his employer for fifty-two years, took the first "movies" in history. The immortal sneezes, brought on at the right moment by the use of snuff, was filmed on a strip of nitro-cellulose one inch wide and fifty feet long, says the New York Herald Tribune.

It was shown by a contraption which Edison called the kinetoscope. Edison himself regarded it as a tricky little toy with no great possibilities for future development.

His Sneeze the First Comic

Mr. Ott's film career began and ended with the sneeze. In later years he often recalled with pride that "my sneezes were the first comics," but the triumph did not go to his head. He had no ambition but to remain in the inventor's service as a designer and master craftsman.

With his brother, the late John Ott, Mr. Ott was one of the small group of "Edison Pioneers" who had worked with the inventor for fifty years or more. He was the oldest employee of the Edison plant when he retired soon after Mr. Edison's death in 1931. The passing of the inventor was a great shock to the brothers and hastened the death of John Ott, who died while reading newspaper tributes to his employer.

Mr. Ott first became associated with Edison in 1874 when the latter and J. T. Murray, a partner maintained a small plant on Ward Street, Newark. Later Edison withdrew from the partnership to conduct private research and experiments and Mr. Ott remained with Murray.

He rejoined Edison in 1893 when the inventor opened a laboratory at Avenue B and Seventeenth Street, New York. Here he worked on the development of the electric light and a lamp which later was used for municipal street lighting.

When Edison established a lamp factory in East Newark, Mr. Ott went there and continued his experiments. Then the inventor turned his attention to the kinetoscope and one day, in a small plant at West Orange, Mr. Ott was pressed into service as a moving subject for the first experimental film.

Worked on Submarine Detection

During the World War Mr. Ott worked with Edison aboard the S. S. Sachem in the development of a submarine detection device. Later the two experimented with a process by which they attempted to manufacture rubber from goldenrod.

Mr. Ott was one of the first to organize an exhibition of Mr. Edison's outstanding inventions and developments. In 1896 he exhibited an X-ray apparatus at a New York electrical show. In 1901 he exhibited Edison's first storage battery at the Pan-American Exposition at Buffalo. Even after his retirement Mr. Ott was consulted frequently by officials and scientists of the Edison plant.

In his will, Mr. Edison provided a legacy of $8,000 for Mr. Ott. Surviving are his wife, Mrs. Emma H. Miller Ott; three sons, Frederick W. Ott and John H. Ott, of Orange, N. J., and Alva Edison Ott, of East Orange, and a daughter, Mrs. Elma Peppel, of Belleville, N. J.

Funeral services will be held Tuesday night at the Weatherhead Funeral Home, in Orange, with the Rev. Henry S. Pearce, pastor of the Patterson Presbyterian Memorial Church, of West Orange, officiating. Burial will be at Fairmount Mausoleum, in Newark, on Wednesday.

Canada Pushes Plan To Settle Its Northwest

lature a year ago.

A central organization committee set up at the meeting will cooperate with other bodies in promoting the plan, it was decided.

General Hornby said that he planned to organize other provinces to take similar action.

The plan for organized immigration met with opposition from several sources during the convention. Labor union officials, members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, Canada's third party, and two farmers' organizations urged delay in starting any plan because of troubled economic conditions in western Canada, especially in Saskatchewan agriculture.

In 1933 and 1934 Canada sent more people back than she received from Great Britain, and in 1933 alone 4000 British were deported, warned M. J. Coldwell, Saskatchewan member of Parliament and National Secretary of the C. C. F.

"I am opposed to any plan of immigration until such time as our Canadian farmers have raised their standard of living, and our youth is given the opportunity which is rightfully theirs," Mr. Coldwell declared.

Referring to the presence at the convention of two British proponents of immigration, Sir Patrick Hannon, Member of Parliament and chairman of a British parliamentary committee on emigration, and R. S. Dalgliesh of Newcastle-on-Tyne, Mr. Coldwell declared:

"If these eminent visitors had travelled through districts of Saskatchewan not supervised by railways and other interested parties, they would witness abominable conditions here.

"They would see people in some districts living in sod shacks, their children starving and without proper clothing. Until the Government has raised the standard of living here, we have no right to invite our fellow-Britishers from the old country to share our hardships," he concluded.

So lively has become the issue raised that a committee is being organized to advise British not to come to Saskatchewan at this time.

Future Of German Nation Puzzles World Observers

Continental expansion in which the reconquest of territories lost in the World War would be merely a minor incident that might satisfy old "bourgeois" sentiments but not National Socialist ambitions, which envisage far more—namely the unification of all European Germans within the borders of a greater Reich, the coordination of all Germans in the world in the service of that Reich, the acquisition of new territory at the expense of Russia and the Baltic border States, and finally the destruction of France, "the implacable, deadly enemy of the German people."

His course is depicted as the only sure means of establishing peace in Europe—a German peace, of course; after it has succeeded, and not before, can Germany concern herself with her place in the world at large.

The flavor of the book and its fundamental contents are suggested in the opening sentences, which show the aim, indicate the methods and above all reveal the nature of the author who, at 35 and in the moment of his greatest failure, personifies history in himself and does so with such self-assurance that in time he persuaded the majority of the German people to accept him at his own valuation. He starts out: "I view it today as a happy circumstance that Fate allotted to me as my birthplace Braunau on the Inn. For that little town lies on the border between those two German States, the reunion of which appears to us younger ones at least as the task of our lives to be carried through with all means.

"German Austria must go back again to the great German Motherland, and not for any more economic reasons. No, no! Even if this reunion, seen economically, should prove to be immaterial, or even harmful, it would have to take place nevertheless. Common blood belongs in a common Reich. The German people have no moral right to colonial activity as long as they have not embraced even their own sons in a common State."

And in the political testament which this book becomes for the German people, Hitler specifically warns them: "Never tolerate the creation of two continental powers in Europe; see in the creation of a second military power on Germany's borders an attack on Germany; prevent the creation of such a power with all means, even the use of armed force."

Statements Surprise

Even the startling violence of Hitler's and Goebbels's attacks upon bolshevism and the equally startling vision pictured by Hitler of what he could do "if the Ural, with its immeasurable raw material, Siberia with its rich forests and the Ukraine with its immeasurable grain fields lay within Germany," were fashioned long ago in this book, which denounces the Bolshevist leaders as "common blood-spotted criminals, the scum of humanity," which pictures Russia as a State originally organized by Germanic masters ruling over an inferior Slavic race, but now, unfortunately fallen into the hands of Bolshevist Jews from whom it must be saved by the German sword and plow. To make this possible, argues the book, France must be destroyed in order to safeguard Germany's back, because to maintain herself France must ever seek to smash and dissolve Germany—and the author is candid enough to admit that if he had been Clemenceau at Versailles he would have done just what Clemenceau did.

But how to attain so vast an objective? The book outlines three methods: propaganda, diplomacy, force. By use of all three of them the first part of the program is already virtually completed—namely, the attainment of power, domestic coordination, and the preparation of the German people, including their rearmament.

The larger part of the program outlind in the book, for which all that has been done so far is intended to be merely preparation, still awaits fulfilment—if it is still part of the program. Obviously German foreign policy, heretofore largely defensive, has gone over to the offensive. Since its diplomacy has failed so far to obtain the desired allies, the National Socialists are backing it up with their most effective weapon, propaganda. With it they have declared a holy war against "Jewish bolshevism" and under that banner they are carrying the Nazi campaign against Russia beyond the borders of the Reich, seeking to force all nations to line up with Germany by mobilizing their public opinion at home. Thus the Communist International finds its counterpart in a "Fascist International."

Difficulties Encountered

The drawback of so frank an exposition of so sweeping a political program is, of course, that it often rises up to plague its author, now turned statesman. Mussolini has censored himself by banning all his earlier writings, which are now available only in libraries to history students of proved harmlessness. Hitler has disdained to follow a similar course, or even to revise his book, for one reason because the doctrine of the book is now the official doctrine of the Third Reich, if not in detail, then in principle. One element of safety lies in the fact that only Germans will read the book through and study its implications, and that most foreigners, even if they read it, would not understand it.

Hitler, moreover, has expurgated from the later editions some of the embarrassing passages, such, for instance, as the reference to the German people as a particularly gullible lot, although, in the main, he stands by what he has written. The popular edition of the work sold in Germany remains, on the whole, intact, and anybody who runs may read it, and quote from it—except the German press.

The foreign language editions, on the other hand, censor themselves by the mere translation, for it is almost impossible to render the flavor and full implications of important passages in any language except the German. Some translations, again, are obviously "edited" with a view to softening the rough spots. The worst example of that lot is the English translation published in London. It has eliminated most of the passages referring to France; it has even eliminated the justification of war cited in the opening of the book and toned down the language to the point of falsification.

French Relation

Finally, France, the country most affected by the book, has no translation of it at all. Hitler has steadily refused to authorize a French translation, and an unauthorized translation issued in Paris was suppressed on the ground of copyright violation after an appeal to the French commercial courts by Hitler's publishing house.

The authoritative explanation of the embarrassing passages and Hitler's refusal to revise them is that they were written at a time of special stress when Germany was suffering from African troops in the Rhineland, from the Ruhr occupation and reparations—but that circumstances alter cases, that the German people have changed as well as the French and other nations, that Hitler's present views are laid down in his speeches and pronouncements of state, and that he does not need to revise what he wrote before coming to office and what was valid in its time.

When pinned down on this point, as he was by Bertrand de Jovenal, a French journalist, Hitler explained:

"You want me to correct my book, like a writer who issues a new edition of his works. But I am no writer. I am a politician. I make my corrections in my foreign policy, which aims at understanding with France. If I should succeed in such a German-French rapprochement, that in itself would be a correction that is dignified. I enter my corrections in the great book of history."

Book Popular

Besides all its other distinctions, the book has the merit that it made Hitler a rich man—a millionaire who is able to renounce his official salary. Of all the National Socialist authors, only Alfred Rosenberg with his "Mythos of the Twentieth Century" and Julius Streicher with his Stuermer have achieved any comparable financial success, and they are running far behind.

How much Hitler personally profited from his book is impossible to put in figures. On the basis of the usual royalties paid successful authors, say about 20 per cent on a book, the popular edition of which sells at about three dollars, this profit should amount to well over $1,000,000 in Germany alone, besides the royalties on the foreign translations.

But a large, perhaps the larger, part of this income Hitler put right back into the business, especially in the beginning, when the sales were smaller. (They reached 600,000 before Hitler came to power, jumped by a round million in the first year of Hitler's chancellorship, and are still increasing rapidly.) This income helped finance the movement during its lean years, and formed the financial backbone of the Franz Eher Publishing House, Hitler's own, which issued the costly Voelkische Beobachter, the official party organ, and other propaganda publications.

In any case, "Mein Kampf" has become part of Germany's destiny, and if its program finally succeeds, the world will be treated to the spectacle that an Austrian first had to conquer Prussia in order that Prussia may conquer Austria.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Martyr Of Vision

Joseph Plateau (1801-1883), professor of physics and astronomy at the University of Gand, Belgium, left his laboratory and gazed unblinkingly at the midday sun for the incredible space of 20 seconds. He had looked at the source of all vision for a longer time than any mortal has ever done, but it cost him his eyesight. But while he was blind, he continued to write monumental works on vision, which rank with the most important ever written. Professor Plateau also invented the Fantoscope, a contrivance which is considered to have been the prototype of the moving picture machine.

U.S. Chamber Head Congratulates Roosevelt

Domei

WASHINGTON, Nov. 16—Following a conference with President Roosevelt, Mr. Harper Sibley, president of the United States Chamber of Commerce, said in an interview with pressmen today that he congratulated Mr. Roosevelt on his re-election to the U. S. presidency.

He added that he told President Roosevelt the Chamber has always supported 100 per cent the Administration's foreign policies, particularly in connection with reciprocal trade agreements.

Mr. Sibley estimated that since the inauguration of the present administration, industry has absorbed around 3,500,000 men, of whom 3,000,000 men got their jobs this year. He said that the Chamber is satisfied that there are less than 4,000,000 people who are eligible for industrial employment, excluding the jobless of professional type.

Salengro, French Interior Minister, Commits Suicide

afternoon. The funeral, it is understood, will not be national but municipal. The Minister will be buried in the same place where his wife is resting.

Reports from Paris indicate that Mr. Marx Dormoy, Socialist, now Undersecretary of State for Interior, or Mr. Georges Monnet will be likely choices to succeed Mr. Salengro. Some quarters, however, mentioned Mr. Camille Chautemps, Minister without Portfolio, as a possibility.

Observers declared that with reference to rightist charges that Mr. Salengro was a deserter from the French army, it is noteworthy to recall that a national "Jury of Honor" recently absolved Mr. Salengro of all desertion charges, finding that he went into No-Man's Land to rescue a wounded comrade.

Captured By Germans

There is one feat in Roger Salengo's career that few men, if any, have ever equalled.

Captured in 1915 by the Germans, he was ordered to work in a munitions factory. Not only did he refuse to work but to the anger and amazement of his captors Salengro organized a strike among the workers. After appearing before three German courts martial he was convicted to two years of hard labor.

That dramatic episode is a key to Salengro's character. Hard boiled, tenacious, determined to pursue his cause to its logical end, Salengro was Blum's natural choice for the Ministry of Interior which is considered the most powerful cabinet post in France.

Salengro was made secretary of the Northern Socialist Federation immediately after the war having gained prominence for his subversive articles and speeches. In 1925 he was elected mayor of Lille, and in 1928 was elected to the Chamber of Deputies.

Roosevelt Greets 3 New Envoys

Italian, Spaniard And Canadian Present Their Letters Of Credence To President

Three diplomats of important nations presented letters of credence to President Roosevelt at the White House on October 20 in assuming their duties as the official representatives of their countries in the United States, and all, in their formal remarks, made references to important questions, according to the New York Times.

The diplomats were Fulvio Suvich, the Italian Ambassador; Fernando de los Rios, the Spanish Ambassador, and Sir Herbert Marler, the Canadian Minister

Mr. Suvich referred by implication to the efforts he will make toward the resumption of negotiations for a reciprocal trade agreement. Sir Herbert lauded the Canadian American reciprocal trade agreement in terms that President Roosevelt echoed, and the Spanish Ambassador mentioned with deep feeling the civil war through which his country is passing, and his faith, strengthened by observations in this country, in liberty and democracy.

Suvich for Closer Relations

Ambassador Suvich expressed the hope that "the relations between our countries, which are already cordial, may soon become still closer and deeper in the fields of policy, economics and culture."

"My four years of close collaboration with the Duce of Fascist Italy justifies me in declaring with full confidence that every step in this sense will be warmly welcomed by the Italian Government and people," he said.

President Roosevelt, in reply, assured him that he would find "sympathetic consideration among all officials of the American Government and a readiness to collaborate for progressive understanding and peace."

Sir Herbert Marler, after referring to the friendly relations of Canada and the United States, said:

"It is a matter of particular gratification that the commercial relations between our two countries have recently been placed on a new and improved basis by the conclusion of the trade agreement which came into effect last New Year's Day."

President Roosevelt declared that friendly relations between the two countries had become "axiomatic" and then said:

"We share in the gratification of your government that our commercial relations have been placed on a new and improved basis as a result of the trade agreement."

Recalls Reception in Canada

He added:

"I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without referring to the very warm welcome which was given me this Summer on the occasion of my brief visit to Quebec. That welcome was a concrete manifestation of the cordial feeling to which you have referred and no experience has given me greater satisfaction and pleasure."

Mr. de los Rios declared:

"If at all times upon arriving in this splendid and youthful land I have felt my faith strengthened in the efficacy of liberty as the formula which protects all that is in the human conscience, and in democracy as the only institution capable of resolving all discords into harmony, today, with my Spanish heart torn by the invasion of a foreign force which has broken the regime of law and order in my country, this faith is renewed and I pray and hope, in the name of my government, that never, never may this great people depart from its historical path—the path of peace in so far as it is that of justice.

"In the name of my country and of the President of the Spanish Republic, I wish to convey to Your Excellency my profound and most sincere wishes to the end that the fates of history may be propitious to your great people, in order to make a reality of the enlightened principles of liberty and democracy which at the present hour are menaced on this earth.

Praises the President

"In the name of my own Spain, a democratic republic which has respected, respects and will always respect all legitimate interests under the protection of its laws, I wish again, Your Excellency, to express my sincere desire to strengthen the friendly relations now existing between my country and the United States, the origin of whose history contains not a little of our spirit, and I repeat to Your Excellency the sincere admiration with which my country, a land of discoverers, follows your efforts to find new and practical ways of satisfying desires for justice."

In reply, President Roosevelt said in part:

"I trust that you will assure His Excellency the President of the Spanish Republic that the people of the United States sincerely desire to preserve the friendly relations now existing between them and the people of Spain and warmly reciprocate the wishes for a propitious future which you have expressed in his name and in the name of your country."

Amau Praises Foreign Press Correspondents

ference. Upon reading the press report of Admiral Yamamoto's alleged remarks, some of the foreign correspondents asked if what I had told them was true. I answered "I never tell a lie!" Based on this remark one of the Chicago newspapers published an article describing my interview with foreign correspondents under the conspicuous title "the George Washington of Japan."

"What is surprising to me about the foreign correspondents is their diligence and omniscience. Confronted, as they are, by tremendous difficulties arising from the radical differences in language, customs and manners, and furthermore greatly handicapped by various inconveniences arising from such conditions, —for which I can not but sympathize with them—they seem to carry on their work perfectly and efficiently. It is really astonishing that they are thoroughly informed of things Japanese, at least of everything printed in Japanese newspapers of all kinds. It is not rare, indeed, that I am put into the embarrassing position of having to explain to them on some news reported by the Japanese press of which I am entirely ignorant. In such a way as this, these foreign correspondents give me lessons in Japanese affairs. I am really the man least informed.

Placed In Dilemma

"When a group of Australian school girls visited Japan, I invited them to a tea party, at which many of them asked for my signature—my name with my official title. I hesitated to mention my official title, thinking myself yet unworthy of it. However, as they strenuously insisted, I signed 'Director of the Un-Information Bureau and Outspokesman of the Foreign Office.' I think I am pretty outspoken, but probably the foreign correspondents wish that I were more outspoken as I know that the Japanese pressmen do. But my colleagues and friends always advise me not to speak much. Really I am always on the horns of a dilemma—whether to comply with a demand for reticence from one side or to meet the desire for more news from the other. These two opposite poles will probably never meet, though the East may sometimes meet the West.

"At any rate I must be content with the growing recognition given to the post of the Director of Information Bureau. About 15 years ago when the late Baron Ijuin sat like a Buddha in the big armchair of the Chief of the Information Bureau, there were only one or two pressmen visiting his office. Our old records show that, at the Imperial Garden Party to view the chrysanthemums held in 1904 there was only one foreign correspondent invited to the party through the Foreign Office, and that was a newspaperwoman from Switzerland. Mr. Byas said just now that only three correspondents were here when he came to Japan some twelve years ago. Since then foreign correspondents came, but their number was always insignificant. But this year we handled more than forty invitations to the same party for so many foreign correspondents. You can easily imagine how prosperous my business has become in recent years.

What Not To Control

"These newspapermen pursue their work quite independently—they are their own kings in their field, submitting to no control, save to that of their own professional conscience. However, we frequently hear voices from abroad that Japan is not controlling what she ought to control, but she is controlling what she ought not to control.—the former referring to birth control, the latter to news control. Whether Japan ought or ought not to control birth is a question which is not timely to treat here now. The matter had better be left to Providence. But as regards the question of the news control, I can not help touching it.

"Newspapers have, I think, two diametrically opposed sides, one is constructive, the other, destructive. Unfortunately the destructive side of the newspaper is working more powerfully, especially in Japan, where innumerable newspapers and magazines are published and even a small journal can cause irremediable damage. To preserve readers and the general public from such damage, it may indeed be necessary sometimes to restrain the publication of a certain kind of news. But it is desirable to avoid as far as possible any exercise of official restraint over news. Moreover, it is practically impossible to establish complete control over it.

"Therefore, if the Government is obliged to lay a ban upon news it should be limited to cases of absolute necessity and of shortest duration. And it is our ideal to abolish such practice entirely. What is desirable concerning publicity through the press can be accomplished only through a sympathetic understanding of one another's position and this will be more effective and lasting. This is what I am striving for. Whether I can or can not succeed in this effort depends largely upon the newspaper correspondents and the public whose cooperation I earnestly desire.

"The Rotary Club has its motto 'Service above self' and 'He profits most who serves best,'—very admirable principles to observe. On my own part, I would adopt that motto and say 'Service above self: I serve my best: the public profits most.'"

A barn dance will be held at the Y.C. and A.C. this evening. The room will be decorated to look like a barn and the refreshments, consisting of such rural fare as pumpkin pie, apple cider, hot dogs, hambugers and draught beer, will be served in the "shed."

WOMEN'S CLUB MEETING

The next meeting of the Women's Club of Tokyo on November 30 will take the form of a visit to the Meiji Confectionery Company's factory in Kawasaki. The visit was arranged by Mrs. A. Oltmans, the chairman of the civics committee. Members are meeting at Kawasaki station at 2:20 p.m. where they will be met by members of the civics committee and given circulars explaining what is to be seen in the factory. The inspection of the factory will start at 2:30 p.m. and at the conclusion of the inspection tea will be served through the courtesy of the company.

The library of the Women's Club in the American Club will be open from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. on Monday as usual.

RETURN FROM SHANGHAI

Mrs. Georges Stoicesco, Mrs. Arthur Garrels and Mrs. G. C. Merrill all returned from a brief trip to Shanghai Thursday, by the Empress of Canada.

SUCCESSFUL VIOLIN RECITAL

Mr. Kazuye Ohoka, noted violinist and teacher at the Ecole de l'Etoile du Matin de Tokyo held his second violin recital at the Nippon Seinenkai Hall, Aoyama, at 7 p.m. last Friday. There was a large audience and the musician was warmly applauded when he completed the program.

Mr. Ohoka played the Sonata No. 5 by W. A. Mozart, of which Allegro aperto and Rondo were well interpreted. The Ciacconia, famous violin composition by Bach was also played perfectly. Some of his pupils played between the first part and the second part of the program. They were Messrs. Akio Naha Nagaoka, Noboru Watanabe, Masaharu Tsumura, Tomi Ashida, Sumio Tejima and Yoshinori Hamamoto. These boys showed progress and promising talent.

Mr. Ohoka played in the second part of the program, "Song of the ruined Castle" by Rentaro Taki and Koscak Yamada, "Schon Rosmarin" by F. Kreisler, "Waltz in A-major" by Brahm and "Tambourich Chinois" by F. Kreisler.

The annual Thanksgiving Day Service of the American community in Yokohama will be held on Thursday, November 26, at 5 p.m. in the Union Church. Mr. Richard Fyfe Boyce, the American Consul, will read the President's Proclamation subject being: The Pilgrims of 1936 Look out on Their World.

The first meeting of the Community Study Group, composed of members of the Christ Church and Union Church congregation, Yokohama, will be held in the Union Church Community House at 6 p.m. Sunday December 6. The Rev. John C. Holtom of the Kanto Gakuin Theological School will lead a discussion on the subjects: The Church, State, and Individual in the Modern World. Plans for the future program and policy of the group will be formulated at this meeting. Members of the Community who are interested are asked to reserve the date.

One of the outstanding social events of the season in church circles was the annual Thanksgiving Dinner of the Yokohama Union Church congregation on Wednesday when eighty people gathered in the Community House for an evening of sociability and fellowship. The guests of honor were twenty-two American and British young people of Japanese parentage residing in Yokohama. The tables were tastefully decorated with fruit, berries, bright colored leaves and candles, with handpainted menu cards, all of which represented the handiwork of Mrs. I. Y. Stauker. A bountiful repast was served under the direction of Mrs. Rudolph Boller and Miss Priscilla Bekman. Rev. H. W. Schenck, the Pastor, acted as toastmaster and extended greetings to the guests who made a suitable response through Mr. Shuichi Horikoshi. A gift was also presented to Miss Clara Loomis, one of the charter members of the Church, who is leaving Japan the end of this month upon her retirement from the Doremus Girls' School of which she has been principal many years. In accepting the gift Miss Loomis told of her connection with the Union Church during the various vicissitudes connected with its growth. Community singing under the leadership of Miss Helen Zander was another pleasant feature, while later two travel films were shown through the courtesy of the Ford Motor Co.

Solving World's Future Electric Power Problem

periments on the Cuban coast.

By creating a vacuum in his apparatus, Dr. Claude caused the surface heat of 86 degrees to evaporate water in his boiler; and by discharging this steam at the other end of the appartus into a sealed chamber chilled by the cold water pumped from the ocean depths, he caused the steam to be instantly condensed back into water. Thus the vacuum in the system was heightened; in consequence, the newly generated steam from the boiler end continuously rushed to fill the void at the condenser end, and in its journey was led by pipes through a turbine and so made to turn the vanes of a rotor.

New Energy

"Such a process capable of taking from the sea the energy of ten Niagaras, will convert wildernesses in populous communities," predicted Dr. Claude. His own experiments were plagued by accidents which delayed his program again and again and disrupted his apparatus on more than one occasion. But he had the satisfaction of demonstrating that such a power plant would work. Electricity generated by his ocean installation at Matanzas lighted forty large incandescent lamps and kept them glowing for the period of the demonstration. The practical industrial application of the idea remains to be worked out in an installation where the power output will be economically related to the capital investment.

An even more obvious source of ocean energy is that provided by the movement of the tides—a subject much publicized in connection with the government project recently begun at Passamaquoddy Bay in Main, but now suspended. It is estimated that the total braking action of the tides on the earth amounts to about 20,000 million horsepower on the average, but what percentage of this may be economically harnessed to produce mechanical power is a question.

No doubt a great deal of the tidal movement will become cheaply available eventually, and industries along seacoasts will find the weight of the waters of falling tides a convenient means of driving their generators and supply their electrical energy. But whether such coastal plants could power continental interiors is a doubtful problem. The problem might be solved by the development of a new electrical conductor having low resistance to the passage of a current, or by the attainment of a wireless system of power transmission.

Winds and Tides

Winds are not so strictly localized as the tides. J. B. S. Haldane has predicted that 400 years hence the threatened shortage may be relieved by the use of windmills. He envisions the establishment of great power plants in which the generators are driven by highly efficient wind motors—and it is interesting to note that a group of American utility companies recently set up an experimental plant powered by giant motors driven by the wind.

Certainly there is power in the winds. The annual energy, as estimated by Dr. Lamb, is more than 12,000 times that of the world's annual supplies of fuel (coal, oil and gas)—a volume surely ample to provide a wide margin of expansion for many centuries to come. The intermittent nature of winds would require some system of storing the electrical energy as it is generated, and thus accumulating a supply for steady or emergency use. An obvious method, often suggested, is gravitational storage—i.e., using the energy to pump water to elevated reservoirs, and then releasing the water to drive water wheels by its fall.

But Dr. Haldane has suggested for his projected wind-power plants an even more efficient method of storage by chemical means. He would use the electrical energy to break down water into its hydrogen and oxygen and store these gases as fuels.

Vaster than the energy of the winds and the waters, hundreds of millions of times the energy of the world's annual fuel output, is the energy poured upon the earth by the sun. It amounts to about a horsepower to every square yard of surface on which sunlight falls.

Sun Motors

One of the exhibits in the array of power machines on display in Washington is a sun motor. It consists of a boiler heated by solar rays to a temperature of 400 degrees F. and an engine driven by the steam generated in this solar boiler. It develops half a horsepower from the rays collected by a mirror of twelve square feet—and larger units are practical, says its inventor, Dr. Charles G. Abbot, the well-known solar astronomer and secretary of the Smithsonian Institution.

Dr. Abbot's device shows a marked gain in efficiency over previous designs of solar motors, and may be regarded as an important step toward that economy in which we may get our power directly from our star instead of indirectly, as at present, via the solar energy stored in fuels and in the rains which feed our waterfalls.

Some sort of energy storage is a necessary auxiliary to solar power plants, to care for demands during periods of darkness and cloudiness. Haldane's chemical storage scheme should be just as effective for solar power as for wind power. By thus splitting water into its two chemically active gases, hydrogen and oxygen, a supply of fuel for internal combustion engines would be continually in the making. Weight for weight, says Haldane, liquid hydrogen is "the most efficient known method of storing energy, as it gives about three times as much heat per pound as petrol."

Perhaps liquid hydrogen is the most efficient form of energy storage we know how to use—but Nature knows a more compact method. It uses atomic storage. And while we are still groping for the master key to unlock its method and cannot say that we have an inkling of the hidden process, we do know something of the mighty forces locked up in the atom.

Belgium Declares Independence In Defense Policy

Separate Action Necessitated By Trend Of Events On Continent

BRUSSELS, Oct. 28—The text of the Government's National Defense Bill, which was tabled yesterday, was issued late tonight. The Bill provides for an increase of 10 months in the period of military service for all infantry regiments, beginning with the class to be called to the colors in 1937. The period of military service thus becomes 18 months compared with the present eight.

In justifying the Bill the Government explain that recent technical developments have completely changed the problem of national defense. The progress of aviation and the growth of mechanization compel them to envisage the possibility of a sudden and smashing attack. The reoccupation of the demilitarized zone in the Rhineland on March 7, 1936, and subsequent events have added greatly to their difficulties. The Army can be mobilized only if the operation can be adequately protected, and it is the aim of the Government's Bill to provide that protection.

Increase in Strength

Under the present system of eight months' military service in the infantry, the General Staff was faced with the problem during four months of the year of effectively guarding the frontiers with a greatly reduced military establishment. By increasing military service to 18 months this difficulty is surmounted, and the effective strength of the Belgian Army on a peace footing is increased by some 60 per cent. (the percentage varies according to the month in which the comparison is made). In addition to increasing the size of the conscript Army, the Bill proposes to maintain the present volunteer force at a strength of 26,000 by enrolling released conscripts for a minimum period of three years, says the Times, London.

The Government go on to explain that the size of each annual class called to the Colors will not exceed 44,000 men, and that in so far as this number is attained the authorities will accede to the request made in the Army Commission that the period of military service should not greatly exceed 12 months. But it is pointed out that effective protection of the Belgian frontier demands the constant cooperation of all the means of passive and active defense. That means that for the purpose of passive defense it will be necessary to keep skilled men in the Engineer Corps under the Colors during the entire year. Active defense is at present assured by frontier cyclist corps, the Chasseurs Ardennais, cavalry corps, the forts of Liege and Namur with adequate garrisons, infantry regiments, and machine-gun battalions. These services are to be strengthened.

In order to protect Belgium against the catastrophe of a new war, the Government conclude, it is essential so to organize national defense as to deter any Power which might be tempted to invade Belgian territory. And the new plans now submitted ought to make it possible to mobilize and to concentrate the Belgian Army upon any threatened point.

Foreign Policy

Belgian foreign policy formed the subject of a long speech by M. Spaak, the Foreign Minister, in the Chamber this afternoon. The public galleries were crowded, and among those who heard the debate were the British and French Ambassadors.

M. Spaak had little to add to the declarations which he has already made. He explained that the foreign policy of the Government was dictated by a number of fundamental considerations, which he summarized as follows:—

They must refuse to intervene in the internal affairs of other countries;

They must sacrifice none of their interests on the altar of ideological crusades;

They must keep their engagements on condition that they were clear; and

They must pursue a Belgian policy with due regard to Belgium's geographical position.

No Return To Neutrality

There was no question of their return to their pre-War status of neutrality, M. Spaak said. They would remain in the League.

So long, however, as the League was not universal, collective security and mutual assistance would not be dependable. Belgium would remain completely faithful to her existing commitments, but Germany's violation of the Locarno Treaty had created an entirely new situation. Temporary steps had been taken, as a result of conversations between the British, French, and Belgian Governments, to maintain the status quo, but that position was provisional, and the efforts now being made to call a new Locarno Conference showed that the Governments concerned felt it to be so.

M. Spaak could say nothing about the negotiations which were now under way. They were confidential. But he would say again that they did not want to go back to neutrality.

YOKOHAMA LADIES ENTERTAINED

The International Women's Club of Yokohama were entertained with an outstanding unusual, and interesting program at Nozawaya's Social Hall on Friday, November 20, by the Yokohama Rengo Fujinkai and Aikoku Fujinkai assisted by Mrs. Y. Nomura.

Madame Hisako Nakarai, president, opened the program welcoming Mrs. W. Crull, president of the International Women's Club, and its members with the following speech which was translated and read in English by Miss Yama Shimamura.

"On behalf of the Yokohama Rengo Fujinkai and Aikoku Fujinkai I would like to express my hearty appreciation for seeing Mrs. Crull and so many members of the International Women's Club here this afternoon.

"I believe that in a cosmopolitan city like Yokohama what are most needed are the understanding and goodwill among the peoples gathered there. We Japanese want very much to learn about your country and people as much as we would like to have you learn and know our country.

"I appreciate indeed, the purpose of the International Women's Club It is my earnest prayer that your club will grow day by day in size and in spirit to contribute more and more to such a worthy cause.

"Today we have prepared a little program and some strictly Japanese refreshments to entertain you. I sincerely hope that you will see and taste a bit of Japan.

"Again I would like to extend to you a most cordial welcome."

The afternoon's entertainment started with the presentation of a most interesting play entitled "Hachi no Ki," (Potted Trees) given by the Player's Club of the Shohin Girl's High School.

"Hachi no Ki" is taken from a "Noh Play" and was admirably acted by a most capable and talented cast. The stage setting and portrayal of snow most realistic.

This was followed by children's dances given by the pupils of the well known and fashionable Kusakabe Dance School.

The program was divided into two groups. One was given by girls portraying:

1. "Duckling's Mother"
2. "Cat's Wedding"
3. "Jan Ken Pon"
4. "Our Beloved Sailors"
5. "The Folk Dance of Oshima Island"

The boys group presented the Sword Dance.

The children gave evidence of unusual talent and magnificent training.

The closing and outstanding feature of the program was a group of three dances presented by Senryn Nishikawa, a professional artist of great talent, whose interpretation of the:

1. "Travelling Puppet Showman"
2. "Ships Leaving Harbor"
3. "The Mask Dance"

displayed her magnificent skill, grace, and understanding.

A few words of thanks were spoken by Mrs. Crull after which Japanese tea and refreshments were served by the ladies of the Rengo Fujinkai and Aikoku Fujinkai.

A most welcome feature was the attractive programs printed in English and beautifully decorated for the members of the International Women's Club of Yokohama.

Marquart To Command U.S. Yangtze Squadron

Domei

WASHINGTON, Nov. 15—Rear-Admiral Edward J. Marquart, new commander of the sixteenth naval district in the Philippines, will take over command of the American patrol squadron on the Yangtze River early in January, the Navy Department announced today.

Rear-Admiral Marquart will be succeeded by Rear-Admiral George W. Meyers, at present commander of the eighth cruiser division.

Assent of Rome Clause

Domei

LONDON, Nov. 14—That Chancellor Adolf Hitler, before moving to scrap the river clauses of the Versailles Treaty, first obtained the assent and collaboration of Italy, Austria and Hungary, was reliably reported in authoritative quarters here today.

Political circles, meanwhile, predicted that the British Government is likely in the near future to make inquiries of Berlin regarding the denunciation of the Versailles river clause. These quarters added that the German gesture may have great influence on European commercial problems in which many nations are vitally interested.

Most political quarters, though reacting unfavorable to the German step expressed no surprise at the move. They asserted that they had expected for some weeks a Reich move to tear off the last shackles of Versailles.

Private Planes Show Increase In U.S.

reach an airport," Mr. Post said. "There's really some point to having the doorstep of the city where you live, work or mean to pay a business or social call. And that's what marine flying means to practically every important city in the United States, since they all, in the very nature of the country's development, grew up on harbors or along navigable rivers, which provide ideal natural landing facilities for water-flying craft."

In New York all that the visiting seaplane pilot has to do to reach the financial or shopping centers of the city is to alight on the East River and taxi up to the floating turntable ramps at Wall or Thirty-first Street, moor his craft at a "parking" float if he intends to leave it for the day or get out and go about his business if he happens to have an air chauffeur to take the plane away and bring it back at an appointed time. The turn-table rotates the ship out of the water and back in less than a minute after its passengers have been discharged, so that the flying commuter steps out dryshod; there is even a fiber-carpet runner at the city's "skyports" which an attendant rolls down to the door of all arriving planes.

Service Free at Present

At present this service costs the water-flying airman nothing, thanks to the fact that the East River terminals still are operated as W. P. A. projects and the city can collect no fees for their use until it takes over the operation. This is not generally known, save to the flying fraternity, which has been taking full advantage of the situation. Mr. Post estimates that an average of ten private planes a day now regularly use the city's skyports, six patronizing the down town and four the uptown one.

Eventually it is planned to charge a beaching fee of $1 for every average-size airplane using the turntable ramp, and an additional 50 cents if the owner wishes to tie up at the mooring floats. In cases where a plane only delivers its owner or other passengers and makes a pick-up call later, it is probable that only one landing fee will be charged. This would encourage ships not to park at the terminals, where space for such purposes is limited and which probably will be used by owner-pilots who do not hire some one to fly them.

As evidence of the thriving status of water-flying in this area, Mr. Post pointed to activities at the Port Washington seaplane base which was purchased a few years ago by Pan-American Airways. Pending possible use of this terminal in conjunction with its plans for a jointly operated British-American Bermuda-trans-Atlantic flying route, the air line has been operating it as a storage and operating base for private flyers, seaplane charter service operators and itinerant seaplane pilots.

Hangar Comfortably Filled

Walter Christiansen, in charge of the big hangar, reports that it is nearly always comfortably filled—an average of twenty to twenty-five owner-pilots keeping their planes there within ten minutes' flying time of Manhattan's waterfront.

The ships range from tiny, open-cockpit Aeronca "flivver" planes to de luxe family-size cabin ships of the Sikorsky, Waco and Stinson type. One of them, a Rearwin Sportster, little larger than the Aeronca, is the "personal puddle-jumper" of Juan T. Trippe, president of Pan-American Airways. He uses it constantly to commute between New York and his home in East Hampton, L. I., and sees no incongruity in the contrast between it and the great, four-motored, twenty-six-ton Martin Clippers that his company operates across the Pacific.

Another patron of the Port Washington base is Franz Schneider, mining engineer, of 14 Wall Street, who flies back and forth to work in a Stinson cabin monoplane from his yacht at its anchorage off Riverside, Conn. Still others are John M. L. Rutherford, Port Washington motor boating enthusiast, who flies his Waco to Montauk and elsewhere on weekend trips, from which it eliminates all traffic problems, and C. B. ("Sonny") Whitney, chairman of Pan-American's board of directors, who uses a similar ship on similar expeditions.

Two of the duPonts, Henry B. and A. Felix duPont jr., of Wilmington, Del., are marine flying enthusiasts, the former owning a Fairchild "24" cabin monoplane, and the latter a four-place cabin Waco. Mr. Post, who is a veteran sportsman pilot in this division of aviation, tells with relish how A. Felix duPont jr. telephoned him one day at College Point from Wilmington about a meeting both were supposed to attend in the Manhattan financial district. Said Mr. duPont:

"My ship is being warmed up now and I'm taking off right away. Don't forget you're supposed to be on hand, too."

"I'll be there," Mr. Post replied. "My cars outside the office and I'll drive right over." it was reported to the New York Herald Tribune.

He was as good as his word and traffic conditions were no worse than usual, but by the time he reached his destination, Mr. du Pont had flown to New York, left his ship at the downtown skyport and had been waiting for him five minutes at the designated meeting place. Mr. Post believes this incident proves more about the practicability of water-flying than any amount of argument and statistics possibly could convey.

Frequently, he says, Donald Cook, who was appointed some time ago in the Bureau of Air Commerce to supervise construction of riverfront seaplane terminals with relief funds in other cities along the lines of the pioneer projects in New York, finds it necessary to consult with him in his capacity as chairman of the Aeronautical Chamber of Commerce marine air terminals committee. There is a quiet place near the Edo plant in College Point where the two can confer over a good lunch and, by air, from the Thirty-first Street skyport, after Mr. Cook has finished his business in New York, it is only a five-minute trip.

Vessels In Distress Off Virginia Cape

Domei

NEW YORK, Nov. 17—A radio message received here today from the British freighter Tweedbank reported that the captain of the 5,627-ton vessel was killed and two seamen washed overboard, 500 miles east of Virginia Cape.

Earlier today, the British freighter Sheaf Spear, 3,050 tons, dispatched a distress call from the same vicinity The s.s. Tulsa, 100 miles away from the Sheaf Spear, reported that she is going to the assistance of the distressed boat.

Bankers Urges Open Dealing In Currencies

of the Treasury, as manager of the fund, was answerable only to the President, who was not under obligation to give an accounting to anybody.

The patern of secrecy was adopted even through the American banking tradition as regards publicity and public accountability was different from the British. Citing only the case of the Federal Reserve, one could point out that the system, early in its career, set out to disclose the maximum, rather than minimum, of information. This practice has been followed almost without a break down to the present day, with constant additions to the daily, weekly, monthly and annual statistics furnished by the Reserve system for the enlightenment and guidance of the public.

So long as France maintained the gold standard, it was possible to make some rough calculations, in spite of the insistence of the British fund on secrecy as regards its own operations, as to the shifting about of capital betwen London, Paris and New York. The British fund operated through purchases and sales of gold in Paris, and it was possible to approximate the British takings since other countries were not so squeamish as the British about saying whence their gold came and whither it went. By deducting the known movements from the total change in the Bank of France's gold reserve and by studying the British exports and imports of gold one could tell in a general way how much gold the British fund was hiding.

Open Paths Barred

But it will no longer be possible to keep track of shifts of ownership of gold between these countries if the present intention of the three funds to keep transactions dark is adhered to. Presumably the three countries will continue to publish figures on gold imports and exports, but if the funds resort to extensive earmarking operations, as seems most likely, then the amount of gold figuring in the settlement of balances between the three money markets will be a figure kept exclusively for the delectation of a handful of men.

Some changes in American statistical procedure will be necessary if the Treasury is to keep the relations of the American fund with the British and French funds absolutely secret. As the records are now kept, purchases and sales of gold to the British and French funds would show up in the monetary gold stock total. Changes in this figure are published daily in the Treasury statement and weekly in the Federal Reserve statistics.

The expectation is strong around here, however, that the Treasury will before long set aside a good-sized block of gold, of between $250,000,000 and $500,000,000 at the minimum, handle gold dealings with other funds through this sequestered gold and give no data on changes in the amount of it. There are some bankers who would concede the point that it was not absolutely essential for the Treasury to show the gold dealings of the fund every day, but they do think it most desirable for the Treasury to report once a week, or, at the worst, once a month, on changes of all kinds in the monetary gold stock.

Since the British are talking now of keeping their fund afloat for at least two more years and defering formal devaluation of the pound that long, it is a certainty that the life of the American fund will be extended beyond its expiry date next January. And if the Treasury does not, in the mean time, show willingness voluntarily to respect the American rather than the British tradition of publicity, it may turn out that an effort will be made to include in the legislation extending the life of the fund some mandatory provisions for publicity.

Press Regimentation

By FRANKLIN ROOSEVELT

In the welter of passion, which is apparently still inseparable from our political campaigns, you and I hear about the liberty of the press—regimentation of the press against the government and regimentation of the press by the government.

It is doubtful if the United States ever had an administration since the days when Washington was accused of despotism and aspiration to kingship that had the slightest desire to muzzle anybody. The unchecked virulence of assaults on almost every administration since the beginning of our history in itself is best proof of that statement.

Social Security Tax On Wages To Start Jan. 1

his employes, the employer must pay an equal amount out of his own funds.

These taxes must be paid by every employe regardless of age until he reaches sixty-five, at which time, under the provisions of the social security act, the employe is privileged to retire on a monthly annuity for the rest of his life, the amount of the annuity being based on his earnings during the period beginning January 1, 1937, and ending with his sixty-fifth birthday.

Yield Is Guaranteed

Assuming a worker to be forty-two years old as of January 1, 1937, and that he earns $1,000 each year until he reaches sixty-five, he will have earned $23,000. He will, therefore, on retirement receive a pension of $31.67 monthly for the rest of his life, but if he does not live long enough to receive in such monthly payments an amount equal to 3½ per cent of the $23,000 in wages which he has earned during the twenty-three years, there shall be paid to his estate the excess between 3½ per cent of his total wages earned during the twenty-three years and the total monthly annuity payments made to him during his lifetime. Should a worker die between January 1, 1937, and before he reaches sixty-five, there is paid to his estate an amount equal to 3½ per cent of the total wages earned from January 1, 1937, to the date of his death.

In other words, the law guarantees to the worker or his heirs 3½ per cent of the wage which he earned beginning with January 1, 1937, and the date on which he reaches age sixty-five.

Tax Covers Only Pensions

These taxes and payments cover only the old-age benefits provision of the law, which is more often referred to as the pension or annuity provision.

The taxes deducted from the wages of the employe as well as those equal amounts paid by the employer are placed in the general funds of the United States Treasury, and do not go directly into any reserves or trust funds. These reserves or trust funds, to be established under the law on the same general basis as the reserve funds accumulated by insurance companies as a protection to their individual stockholders, are to be established only on specific appropriations by Congress each year. These appropriations are to be requested of Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury and to be in an amount which, it is considered, will build up the reserve under somewhat the same rules as apply to private life insurance companies.

Congress Rules Funds

However, Congress at any session may fail to appropriate funds for this purpose, and the Secretary of the Treasury or the President may do nothing about it. In the mean time, the taxes deducted from the wages of the workers are in the general funds of the Treasury for the general purposes of the government, and are in no way set aside, designated, impounded or earmarked for old-age benefits or pensions. They may be used to build postoffices, dredge rivers, construct dams or plant trees, the same as any other funds collected by the government from general taxation.

These reserves as and when appropriated by Congress must be invested only in securities of the United States government or securities guaranteed by the United States government. If these reserves are accumulated along the lines projected, it will mean that eventually, unless the bonded debt of the United States government is tremendously increased, there will not be enough government bonds available in which to invest, even after all the government bonds now held by all the banks and the Federal Reserve System are taken over by these trust funds or reserves under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury, says the New York Herald Tribune.

Further, these bonds held by the trust or reserve funds under the Secretary of the Treasury must pay interest at the rate of 3 per cent to the reserve or trust fund which means that the general taxpayers of the country will have to have Congress appropriate each year beginning somewhere about 1965 between $1,250,000,000 and $7,750,000,000 per annum for interest alone, to be credited to these trust or reserve funds.

These taxes and benefits have no relation to the unemployment compensation section of the law or to the several state unemployment compensation laws.

The employe in New York State does not make any contribution or have any deduction made from his wages or salary under the unemployment compensation law of the state. All such taxes are paid by the employers. There are some states which provide for such contributions under their state unemployment compensation laws. Most of these contributions or deductions from the employes' wages become effective at some future date, although one or two state laws exact such contributions from employes at present.

Generally no benefits are scheduled to be paid under the several state unemployment compensation laws, with the exception of Wisconsin, before January 1, 1938, as all these laws must be in effect for a minimum period of two years before any benefit can be paid. This provision was considered necessary to permit time to build up a reserve fund before undertaking to pay any unemployments benefits.

French Control Of Securities To Be Pushed

change authorities themselves want to have removed. Meanwhile, however, over-the-counter dealing in them is legally barred.

Trading Expense

Customers' expenses on Bourse transactions are made up by commissions, taxes and extra commissions on margin accounts. Commissions are higher on carry-over than on cash transactions; commissions on rents are preferentially low. In the case of the general run of cash transactions, the commission is .30 per cent of the price. Commission charges to the public are thus appreciably higher than in London and New York, but banks receive a 40 per cent rebate from the amount charged to the public. A Government tax, in contrast to London, of 10 per cent is imposed on the buyer and seller in every transaction. Carrying-over of securities entails an additional broker's charge of 3 per cent plus an extra government tax of 2.4 per cent. Carry-overs, therefore, cost 5.4 per cent a year plus the cost of borrowing money. Agitation is rife for the lowering of the commission charges, but this again is a mater of the exchanges' self-administration rather than of outside interference.

Additional Government financial regulations, assuming continuance of France's New Deal, will, consistent with past philosophy, be confined to matters of directors' activities and to new financing and distribution rather than to trading matters. It will be embodied in clearly defined provisions of the civil code, and enforced by penal sanctions.

Christmas Toys Go Sophisticated

Oxygen Tanks For Dolls Are Among The Ultra-Modern Offerings Displayed

When Santa Claus goes on his 1936 shopping tour prior to his annual toy-laden visit, he will rub elbows with a generation of thoroughly sophisticated young people, it was revealed recently when the new offerings for the nursery world were exhibited by the Toy Manufacturers of the U.S.A., Inc., at 200 Fifth Avenue.

A group of children participated in the display and they came away satisfied that the great majority of this year's toys "work." They tried everything, from nursing an incubator baby doll in an oxygen tank to a complete job of landscape gardening in miniature, says the New York Times.

Despite toyland's trend to the ultra-modern, however, the old favorites such as railroad trains, building blocks and tin soldiers are still conspicuous.

The children operated what seemed to include scale models of most every known form of transportation, from streamlined, double-decked buses to electric trains drawing a full equipment of milktank and auto cars, as well as de luxe passenger rolling stock, with observation platforms and indirect lighting.

The outstanding novelty, however, seemed to be in the entire duplication of the "modern" home. Doll house and furniture sets are more elaborate and yet more reasonably priced than ever before, and a careful inspection did not reveal a single "gadget" lacking, whether it was a telephone, radio, electric washing machine or shaving mirror for the bathroom.

The occupants-to-be of these tiny homes were also found to be setting new styles of their own, with perhaps a slight overemphasis on Hollywood's juvenile fashions. These new dolls are of a great variety, however, for where some are marcel-waved and manicured, another type is made of hard rubber and positively unbreakable.

At least half of the exhibit was devoted to equipment designed for scholarly pursuits, and if the manufacturers haven't aimed above their contemporary inclinations the New Year should bring a crop of precocious young master craftsmen, astronomers, chemists, physicists, to say nothing of finished artists.

An unusually varied display of adult parlor games was explained by a manufacturer's representative as an answer to a 100 per cent increase in demand for these items. Even comparatively new games, like Monopoly, now have mahogany boards and cabinets reminiscent of the old Mah Jong sets, and will retail in the $25 range.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

Ribbentrop's Task In London Not Easy

will make recognition of the victorious Insurgent forces distinctively more palatable to the British public.

It is rather from wider questions, especially regarding the tendency of the two powers to act together in such matters as reform of the League of Nations and in the Locarno negotiations, that future complications are feared. The language of the two dictators has too much in common for the British to welcome their collaboration.

Premier Benito Mussolini's offer to Europe of an olive branch "on the points of 8,000,000 well sharpened bayonets" is not liked here any more than some of Hitler's pronunciamentos to a similar effect.

The Times of London this morning sounds this warning in this respect:

"The impression that we love peace at any price needs to be dispelled. It should not be supposed, for instance, that this country is going to be drawn into a war of doctrines, however or wherever it may break out. But any act of aggression against any part of the British Empire or its communications and in neighboring parts of Western Europe will always be met by Great Britain with the full force of her armed resources and elsewhere by participation in such common action as circumstances may dictate."

Mr. von Ribbentrop's first task will have to be to dispel British misgivings with respect to the intentions of the partners in this warlike collaboration. He will have further troubles, perhaps later, by reason of Germany's economic difficulties and steps these may force upon her. The progress of her rearmament beyond even the limits set in the Fuehrer's initial announcement is likely to call for some elucidation if the German intentions are still to be accepted as peaceable.

The Ambassador even faces certain handicaps from past associations here. He will doubtless soon discover that the diplomatic corps in London does not represent any entity in the social meaning of the word, as it does in other capitals; in fact it does not count for so much in this enormous city as elsewhere. The friends who have flocked to him from among former ministers and social lights would not be of much use in his new capacity. He will have to revive contacts that have fallen to some extent into disuse.

In general he has a hard job to tackle.

JAPAN-BRITISH SOCIETY DINNER

Her Imperial Highness, Princess Higashi-Fushimi, was graciously pleased to honor the Japan-British Society with her presence at the annual dinner which was given in honor of H. E. the Baron G. Hayashi, G.C.M.G., G.C.V.O., at the Imperial Hotel on Wednesday evening.

The British Ambassador presided. The toast to His Majesty the Emperor was proposed by the British Ambassador and the toast to His Majesty the King by Mr. T. Matsudaira, Minister of the Imperial Household Department.

The British Ambassador then proposed the health of Baron Hayashi in a felicitous speech to which Baron Hayashi replied in his usual happy style.

After dinner Miss Sai Shoki, the well-known Korean dancer gave a program of seven dances which were greatly appreciated. A Naval Band played during dinner.

Arrangements were in the hands of the Honorary Secretaries, Viscount Yoshitami Matsudaira, K.C.V.O., C.B.E., and Mr. John Gadsby, C.B.E.

Leftists Capture Four Newsmen In War Zone

Domei

AVILA, Nov. 23—Manuel Casanova and Jose Meiras, both editors of the journal Heraldo de Argon, and Marin Chivite, all Spanish subjects and Alfredo Luis Suitto, Uruguayan special correspondent of the Montevideo paper El Pueblo, were captured by the Government forces, it was revealed here today.

According to a correspondent of the Havas News Agency, who was with the group although in another car, the four men disappeared in the vicinity of Navalcarnero. The Havas correspondent opined that they were captured when they attempted to drive to the Casa del Campo by side roads.

Extase

A young man was seen to rush out of a house to the edge of the curb, take a leap in the air, and fall flat on his face. "It's all right," he said to the astonished passers-by. "I've just become engaged to the finest girl in the world, and I quite forgot I didn't come on my bicycle."

Traveller Can Tour Globe In 24 Days

country where things were being done in a casual but precise manner and where aviation as an industry had advanced to the practical accomplishment of a recognized mode of commercial transport on which the public has come to rely much in the same manner as it does on other forms of common carrier.

Last Flight Most Pleasant

The trip east was the most pleasurable of any airline I rode on in the world tour. The crew changed four times, including the trim hostesses, who served the best food I had had this month. In all, I ate eight meals aloft, and at least partly satisfied a pent-up desire for New York restaurants and home cooking.

So kaleidoscopic was the trip that it will be several days, perhaps longer, before the moving curtain of the earth's surface as seen from the air will resolve itself into definite and lasting impressions. That there were many that will stand out after a short rest I know, but at the present writing I can only set down those that took place in the last hours of the flights.

The trip was in no sense a stunt, and it can be duplicated by any traveller who cares to avail himself of modern scheduled transportation. If the trip has proved anything of lasting value to the world of travel, it has been well worth the effort, expense and time allotted me on the assignment.

Drive On Rackets Was Long Planned

To Pave Way For Indictments Dewey Had To Wrest Data From His Witnesses

By RUSSELL OWEN

The indictments obtained by Thomas E. Dewey, special prosecutor in New York County, against men allegedly involved in baking, trucking and restaurant rackets, have shown again the quiet and meticulous way in which he puts together his cases in the first concerted effort to rid Manhattan of this form of extortion. This is his first open attack on business rackets, although his office has been working on these cases since he was appointed in the Summer of 1935.

Mr. Dewey's first objective, in fact, was the business racket, and his indictments and convictions against the loan shark and prostitution rings, although a part of his task, were largely to indicate that he was on the job. For the investigation of organized vice and gambling is much easier than getting evidence against men who use labor unions and protective associations as weapons by which to "shake down" both the worker and the employer, it was reported to the New York Times.

The indictments were only the beginning of this phase of Mr. Dewey's prosecutions. In his work he never discloses his hand until necessary and always has something up his sleeves.

The Vice Investigation

That was strikingly shown by his action in breaking the prostitution ring and convicting Charles (Lucky) Lucania. In that prosecution he took a chance when he ordered his raids on disorderly houses and the bookers for them. He locked up scores of witnesses and defendants, banking on the willingness of unfortunate women to talk of those who had collected tribute from them—and he was very nearly disappointed.

The way in which he got out of that situation is a tribute to his ability and methods. For three days several of his ablest assistants argued with, cajoled and finally persuaded prostitutes and the women who ran disorderly houses to tell their stories. These pointed him directly to the bookers and the racketeers who controlled the business of commercialized vice. Then he was ready to go into court.

The present inquiry has been conducted along different lines. Obviously one could not lock up a lot of restaurant keepers or men who were in the apparently innocent business of conducting trucking and baking companies. Mr. Dewey had to get his evidence by slow and intricate examinations of books and records, and by making reluctant business men testify even though they were threatened with injury or death if they did so.

Methods of Exacting Tribute

The business rackets have been built largely around unions—some of them legitimate, but taken over and dominated by criminals; some of them mushroom unions which no reputable union man would recognize. But because the rackets have been worked under the union aegis, they are difficult to prove.

It is too early to learn much about the way flour-trucking and bakery union rackets have been organized, although they form a definite pattern with intimidation for lack of payment at their base. The baker or the trucker who is approached must give tribute or else he finds his trucks ruined and his routes disorganized.

In the case of the alleged restaurant racket the picture is more definite. It has been estimated that $2,000,000 a year has been the tribute exacted from restaurant employes and owners. A so-called restaurant workers' union would go to the owner and ask for a definite sum each week or month as insurance against labor trouble. If he did not meet the demand, stink bombs might be thrown under the feet of his diners, or sandwich men paid by the hour might parade outside with placards which proclaimed the owners "unfair to union labor."

Or the owner might be asked to join a protective association—a type of racket that is not confined to the restaurant industry. Indeed, there is one industry in the city which is said to be the target of at least forty rackets. If an employer does not wish to join the protective association, he meets the same sort of intimidation that is imposed on him by the racket "union."

Inducing Victims to Testify

The difficulty in dealing with these business rackets is that many merchants or business men are afraid to testify. Almost the only way in which evidence can be obtained is by finding some flaw in the "union" organization or by getting something "on" the business men involved. Nearly every complaint has behind it the threat of prosecution—either for false income-tax returns in the case of the racketeer, or, in the case of the employer, telltale entries unearthed by weeks of patient effort, which he cannot explain without admitting that he has testimony that has been withheld.

This is a task which few prosecutors would undertake. The ordinary District Attorney would not give the time or energy to the painfully slow process of building up a case in a business racket if he had to obtain every bit of evidence by legal processes not necessarily germane to the issue. Twice Mr. Dewey has been compelled to cite prospective witnesses for contempt because of their unwillingness to testify, but that has been a small part of his procedure. In some cases it has been almost impossible to show that a crime had been committed, although crime was plainly indicated.

Mr. Dewey will not talk about his cases. But those who have followed his work have sometimes wondered whether it will ever be possible, working merely locally, to root out the racketeer from the hundreds of holds he has upon business in New York and every other large city. It has been suggested that the only way to accomplish the task is to set up some sort of Federal agency which would have the power to deal with rackets as a whole, since many of them cross State boundaries.

Steward Versus Stewardess Now Air Controversy

E. A. L. Announcement Men Will Be Employed Stirs Arguments On Both Sides

The recent announcement by Captain E. V. Rickenbacker, World War ace and general manager of Eastern Air Lines, that flight stewards would be installed on all of the company's passenger transports starting December 1 has touched off a spirited controversy over the merits of the air stewardess.

Some have asserted that Eastern's action is only the beginning of a general replacement of the stewardess with her less decorative but allegedly more useful masculine counterpart. Just as many others have defended the stewardess with no little degree of feeling as an indispensable supplement of air travel, most of whose duties could be performed by no one but her.

Air Lines Favor Stewardesses

United Air Lines, which employs 166 of the approximately 250 stewardesses serving on American airways, was quick to answer inquiries as to whether they intended replacing the stewardesses with an emphatic "no." They said: "United is proud of its stewardesses and their record of service since we put the first group of eight on duty in 1930." Other companies employing stewardesses in large numbers made similar answers, it was reported to the New York Herald Tribune.

So widespread did the discussion become among air travellers and others interested in developments in commercial aviation that Captain Rickenbacker issued a second statement explaining in detail his company's reasons for choosing men rather than women to look after the comfort of its passengers.

"While we did not intend to raise the hostess versus the flight steward issue—no mention was made of it in our original announcement—we certainly take this opportunity to explain our revolutionary action," he said. "The prevalent hue and cry is: 'What, do away with the decorative hostess? Replace her with a stolid, dignified man who will only serve?' That is precisely the idea, Eastern Air Lines replies.

"It is a mistaken notion that Eastern Air Lines is replacing women with men, for co-pilots have performed very satisfactorily, although to a small degree, the functions which will engross the flight steward on Eastern Air Lines' ships hereafter."

Captain Rickenbacker said that the one argument, aside from the psychological factors that women resented other women serving them and that men were as embarrassed as pleased at the attentions of a hostess or stewardess, was that of service.

Stewardess Gives Her Views

Miss Rosalie Gimple, chief stewardess of the United Air Lines, presented a different picture of the air stewardess when interviewed upon her arrival recently to see a group of women applicants for jobs on her company's planes. Miss Gimple, who was born in Kansas twenty-five years ago, is an attractive gray-eyed girl whose demure manners do not suggest that she holds one of the most exacting executive positions among women in American aviation.

When asked if it was true that the stewardesses under her direction were mainly decorative, her eyes flashed. Before replying she removed a bundle of questionnares which passengers on the company's planes had filled out in reply to a request for criticisms or suggestions, and picked out ten at random.

On eight of the ten forms, the passengers had mentioned the stewardess who had made the trip with them, in such sentences as "I wish to commend the stewardess for her cheerful, thoughtful attention." "The stewardess made our trip most pleasant," and "I especially want to bring to your attention the graciousness, courtesy and charm of the stewardess."

Equally So

A father as lecturing his young son, who had just brought home a disappointing report.

"Remember, my son," he said, heavily, "it will pay you to work hard at your studies. Remember, too, that what you have learned no one can ever take away from you."

The boy thought for a moment, and then nodded.

"Well," he replied, "they can't take from me what I haven't learned, either, can they?"

London's Part In Defense Of England Shown

Elaborate Pageant Arranged To Give History Of City's Activities

The pageant of the Lord Mayor's show has now been fully arranged. It promises to be one of the most picturesque processions that have accompanied the Lord Mayor to the Law Courts for many years. Entitled "London and the Defense of the Realm," the pageant will unfold the story of the rise and gradual development of the Navy and Army and the part played by the old citizens in their foundation.

In and before the sixteenth century each of the 26 Wards of the City, under its Alderman, supplied its quota of armed men, and the ancient City Guilds and Fraternities kept stocks of arms and armor and levied fighting men in proportion to their strength. These early citizens wore no uniform. It was not until the reign of Henry VIII that uniforms came. In 1539 England was threatened with invasion, and the King took steps to fortify the coasts and make ready the Navy. The City forces, commanded by the Lord Mayor in person, were reviewed by the King, and the muster in the fields of Mile End and Whitechapel, and their march through the City, will form the first part of the pageant, the boys of the City of London School O. T. C. providing the personnel. They will be clad, as were the citizens of that remote period, in white, with the arms of the City on back and breast, with the officers in rich colors of silk and satin, with gold chains round their necks.

Trained Bands

Men of the Royal Navy (Nore Command) have been cast for the next group, which will show how, in 1588, the City provided 30 ships to help in the defeat of the Spanish Armada and 12 for the attack on Cadiz by Essex and Raleigh—fighting which was done by "Sea Soldiers." The rise of the Trained Bands will then be shown by men of the 54th (City of London) Anti-Aircraft Brigade. This title arose through Queen Elizabeth having ordered that the fittest men should be selected from the general levy of householders and "trained into bands" in the year of the Spanish Armada. The City's Trained Bands had a total strength of 6,000. At the threat of invasion the number rose rapidly to over 10,000, most of whom were sent to guard the coast. The City also sent out ships which helped in the destruction of the Spanish Fleet. This episode will be represented by a detachment marching to Tilbury Camp, says the Times, London.

The next year chosen is 1643, and the Trained Bands and Auxiliary regiments will be shown by men of the Honorable Artillery Company. The military power of London rose to unprecedented heights during the Civil War, and the City and its suburbs could muster nearly 20,000. This episode will show the massed Colors of the 2 City regiments of foot; and there will be representations of the Red, the White, the Yellow, the Blue, the Green, and the Orange regiments, each of which will be duplicated to indicate that there were "opposite numbers" in the City of London Auxiliaries. There will be pikemen, musketeers, drummers, and ensigns, with the lieutenant-colonels mounted. This will be followed by Trained Bands and Auxiliaries of the Tower Hamlets, represented by the 17th London Regiment (Tower Hamlets Rifles), showing Color parties escorted by armed men of the period.

The Protectorate and After

The year 1665 proides a view of the Navy of the Protectorate, represented by men of the Royal Navy (Nore Command). The years following the Restoration witnessed the formation of the Regular Army, and the part taken by the City is kept alive to this day by the sight of certain units to march through the City with drums beating and Colors flying after application to the Lord Mayor. The King's Royal Regiment of Foot Guards will be represented by men of the 3rd Battalion, Grenadier Guards, recruiting in 1664 for volunteers to serve at sea under Prince Rupert. The Lord High Admiral's Regiment, to be shown by Royal Marines from Chatham, will indicate the development of that force through the Duke of York's Maritime Regiment to the existing position.

In 1665 came the Holland Regiment, whose part is to be taken by the Past and Present Association of The Buffs (London branch.) A party will be seen drum-beating for recruits followed by "The Buffs in the Great War." The Royal Regiment of Fusiliers, raised at the Tower for the Monmouth Rebellion, will be represented by the 2nd Battalion. The Royal Fusiliers (City of London Regiment). Trained Band Grenadiers of 1710 will be depicted by the Honorable Artillery Company. Then will follow the story of the establishment and development of the Royal Regiment of Artillery from the year 1716, by the 91st (4th London) Field Brigade, R. A.

Nelson's Navy

In 1800 comes the Navy of Nelson's day, men of the Nore Command again providing the personnel. The Napoleonic wars once more called the nation to arms, and London took the lead. After acting as O. T. C. for the Trained Bands for 250 years the Honorable Artillery Company severed its connection with that body, and its action will be shown. The Royal Westminster Volunteers of the same period will be represented by the 16th London Regiment (Queen's Westminster and Civil Service Rifles): the Honorable Artillery Company Artillery of 1781 will indicate the story of the Gordon Riots; and the Duke of Cumberland's Corps of Volunteer Sharpshooters will be represented by the 9th London Regiment (Queen Victoria's Rifles).

The Royal Navy in peace time, the coming of steam, and the development of naval uniform will be told in succeeding episodes. Men of H. M. S. President will show the rise of the R. N. V.R. from the Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers of 1876. Other episodes and units inolved are:—1897, 12th London Regiment (The Rangers); 1900, City of London Yeomanry, City (Yeomanry) Battery, R. H. A.; C. I. V. (7th City of London Regiment); 1908, formation of the Territorials (London Scottish, London Irish, The Queen's Own); 1908, 1st Cadet Battalion, The Royal Fusiliers; 1914-18, the Great War (1st Cadet Battalion. The King's Royal Rifle Corps); London troops in France and Flanders, 1915 (90th (City of London) Field Brigade, R. A., and 7th City of London Regiment); London troops in Gallipoli, 1915 (10th London Regiment); London troops in France and Flanders, 1918 (9th London Regiment (Queen Victoria's Rifles). The Royal Naval Air Service, the Royal Flying Corps, and the British Legion will also be represented.

Too Realistic

At a territorial camp a batalion was being instructed on "How to take a convoy through open country." One company was told off to represent a convoy, the men being told that they were to represent horses, cows and wagons. When the order to advance was given, the convoy moved on; but the major noticed that one man continued to lie down. He galloped up to him and said. "Why don't you advance?"

The man replied, "I can't, sir."

"You can't? What do you mean?"

"I'm a wagon, and I've got a wheel off."—Tit-Bits.

struction of receivers would be considerably simplified, but, meanwhile, let not any potential viewer delay ordering a receiving set for fear that a change in these standards might put it out of commission almost at once.

It was an essential feature of the development plans that, for two years after the opening of any service area, no such change would be made therein. For at least two years, therefore, today's receivers, without any radical alteration, would continue to receive Alexandra Palace transmissions. Just how wide this London Service area would prove to be was difficult to say with absolute certainty. Roughtly speaking, it would cover Greater London, with a population of about 10,000,000; or, again roughly speaking, a radius of more than 20 miles with local variations. "There may," he continued," be some surprising extensions. For instance, I should be unwilling to lay heavy odds against a resident in Hindhead viewing the Coronation procession. In the light of experience here, we shall proceed with the location of a second and subsequent transmitting stations, according as public interest justifies this course. Technically, Britain leads today, and Antony Gloster, to 'Keep our light so shining a little in front of the rest.' Today's simple ceremony will live in history, and I am proud to have taken part in it."

Montreal Meeting Cheers An Attack On Communism And Calls For Its Suppression

MONTREAL, Oct. 25.—Accepting the "challenge of communism," 100,000 Roman Catholics here today pledged defense of their faith and declared themselves strongly against religious persecution throughout the world.

Jamming the Craig Street armory and filling Champ de Mars to the limit, the communicants were warned that their "hour has come." Denunciation of communism and its "blood brother," fascism was cheered, says the New York Times.

The only defense against the advancing wave of communism, Mgr. Georges Gauthier, Archbishop Coadjutor of Montreal, said, lay in catholocity, organized by the Comite des Quevres Catholiques.

A series of resolutions adopted at the meeting set forth the following:

A pledge of fidelity to the church.

A protest against religious persecutions, declared to exist in Russia, Mexico and Spain.

A denunciation of Communist propaganda, said to be more active than ever in Canada.

A reminder to civil authorities that it is their duty to prevent subversive movements by the adoption of special legislation.

An invitation to Catholics to group in professional associations totally Catholic.

A demand to governments to do away with the ferment of revolt constituting abuse of capitalism and to apply reforms outlined in the Papal encylcical calling for better distribution of wealth and suppression of economic dictatorship.

After the meeting an overflowing crowd of 2,000 young men blocked traffic while hunting for suspected Communists. They were dispersed by police, who made four arrests.

Bill Against Libel Up Before French Chamber

Domei

PARIS, Nov. 23—Apparently as a direct result of the recent suicide of Minister of Interior, Mr. Roger Salengro, which is ascribed partly to the scandalous campaign of libel turned on him by the local press, a bill providing for the repression of articles defamatory to the character of public officials and rendering the owners of newspapers publishing such articles liable to severe punishment, has been introduced into the Chamber of Deputies.

The bill, which has been tabled by the Chamber, will likely be examined by the Committee for Civil Legislation on Wednesday. The Chamber may discuss the bill on the following day, it is learned.

Thespianism

A stranger in a Lancashire town heard roars of laughter coming from a large hall. He asked the doorkeeper what was happening.

"Amateur Dramatic Club, sir."

"Ah! Doing a comedy, eh?"

"No, sir," said the doorman, grimly. "They're playing 'Hamlet.'"

Tips For Service Annoy To Great Majorities

at the Rainbow Room and a number of hotels; Sam Rosen at the Paradise, Jack Dempsey's, Hickory House and Tony's; Joe Raphael at the Howdy Club, Stork, Versailles, Mon Paree—but all are publicity shy.

Do not throw a greenback recklessly at the pretty hat-check girl and think you are rewarding her for her beauty. None of the money clings to her. It goes right into the clink box and the watcher hired by the concessionaire is close by to see that the tip does not detour. The hat-check girl gets a salary of $20 a week, for working from 6 p.m. to 3 a.m. If the tip is over $5 she may, under a recent ruling, keep half. Cigarette girls are paid $2 to $5 more a week than hat-check girls because they must have sales ability in addition to good looks. The "rackers"—the men and women who hang the coats—get from $22 to $25 a week.

Union Formed

The whole guild, banded together, form a union of between 8,000 and 10,000 members. A lot of the girls are high school and college graduates. Some come from the chorus—though once in a while it is just the reverse—and it is not altogether the money, it seems, that lures them into the job. A lot of them are ambitious for rich husbands and there is no better way to become acquainted with a rich playboy than by handling his hat and coat at the check counter. Every month or so you hear of a cloak-room girl or flower girl who has married wealth. Such romances are the bright legends of the trade.

The concessionaires, though shy, are shrewd folk. They even figure how much each man pays for his hat and coat when he enters a high-class restaurant. The average tip for a hat in the Summer is about 15 cents. The same tipper will go to 20 or 25 cents in the Winter when he checks both a coat and hat. In the middle-class eating places and night clubs the tip for a hat averages between 8 and 10 cents, and the tip for hat and coat in the cold season, between 10 and 15 cents. In any given crowd of diners or night-club customers, the concessionaire figures, he will have about 60 per cent tippers. The other 40 per cent will be women.

Tips in Japan

In Tokyo the Japanese family man never tips when he is out with his wife and children. The woman of the house pays the restaurant bill, because the man considers that trifling obligation a wifely duty. And since a woman's tip is one of the world's great uncertainties, in Japan as elsewhere, the poor little waitress is lucky if she gets anything at all. The Japanese do very little tipping, except in restaurants. They never tip cab drivers, and the hat-check is unknown in the land.

Transplant the Japanese business man—or almost any other Japanese—to the United States, and he will tip with a reckless abandon entirely foreign to his instinct and education. The Elite Headwaiters Association, whose members work in the most expensive restaurants and hostelries in the world, agree that the Japanese visitor to America is, without question, the most liberal of all visitors.

A Japanese journalist who works in New York attributes that to the peculiar sensitiveness of his people. They tip more than others because they fear ridicule. So do the Chinese. The "cultured" Englishman, the "refined" American, the Frenchman, Italian and Russian are rated in just that order by the Elite Headwaiters.

In Washington the chauffeurs who draw assignments to drive distinguished visitors grant first place among foreign tippers to Dino Grandi. He paid $40 in tips for his rides. King Prajadhipok of Siam was second with $30 in tips: Premier Pierre Laval, third, with $20 in gratuities. Prime Minister Ramsay MacDonald paid $15. But you cannot tell much from those figures. You do not, for example, get enough Siamese around to get a good cross-section. Besides, visiting diplomats are probably working on expense accounts. His Majesty Edward VIII, when he came to the United States as Prince of Wales, was a great tipper, but most of his tipping was done by proxy: one of his equerries did the honors.

Effect Of Foreign Exchange On Banking

investment, while on the other hand it will expand the visible metallic reserves of central banks and thus create the necessary atmosphere for an expansion of credit. The same will be true of the incentive given to the production of new gold by the more permanent character now possessed by the higher currency price. Not only will this tend to perpetuate recovery and prosperity in the gold-producing countries, thus providing a persistent and active center of stimulation for more widespread recovery, but it will provide an accelerated output of gold which must find its way into the monetary reserves of the world. The expansionist forces are also of technical character. There are, for example, the tremendous arrears of industrial maintenance and development to be made up in the countries where depression has until now been reigning. The replacement demand for both capital and consumption goods must move up as soon as the beneficial effects of devaluation make themselves felt on the money markets and on industrial and commercial enterprise in the countries concerned—as indeed they have already begun to make themselves felt. The upward trend in prices and profits must also derive stimulation from a somewhat less healthy but for the time being equally effective influence—namely, the world-wide unbalancing of budgets connected mainly with the race in armaments. The strong advance in commodity prices which should ensue from these forces is already in evidence. There has during the past two months been a vigorous upward movement in raw material prices which is persisting despite the liberal elasticity with which the restriction schemes governing the production of a number of the primary commodities affected have been worked. The rise in prices which is under way must increase the profitability of all economic enterprise and lead to a general profit inflation. This movement will no doubt call for careful supervision — especially as part of the recovery will be built on essentially unproductive work—but there is no doubt that for a considerable time it must make for greater prosperity and for a relaxation of that economic pressure on population and on gold and currency reserves which is so responsible for the political problems of the day.

Rise in Prices

The rise in prices must also help in the highly beneficial work of unfreezing international debts, the total or partial default on which now litters the capital markets and banking systems of the world. Higher commodity prices will render the real burden of international obligations less onerous than it has been in the past few years of depressed primary prices and must rehabilitate the capacity both to pay and to transfer of countries which since the slump of 1929 have had to default on their obligations to foreign creditors. This unfreezing process is already apparent in such countries as the South American republics, and it may be expected to spread its welcome influence. As old debts are unfrozen and as defaulted foreign loans are subjected to satisfactory agreements between debtors and creditors the international flow of credit will again be set in motion. As an increasing number of countries become credit-worthy and as the volume and the value of export trade increase we can anticipate a gradual recovery of international acceptance business. This and the attendant discount business is a development from which London has much to expect.

In addition there is the possibility of a return to favor of long-term international lending. As short-term credit again begins to circulate more freely across national boundaries and as more and more countries emerge from the state of default which now bars their way to the world's capital markets the business of long-term foreign lending should again come into its own. In this respect, however, it would be well not to expect rapid developments. In the first place the authorities in this and in other creditor countries are not likely to relax suddenly their present control of foreign lending. Domestic recoveries still have to be consolidated and the cheap money policies cannot yet be endangered by the competition of an uncontrolled revival of foreign lending. Moreover, the investor will after the painful experiences of recent years be inclined to tread very warily in subscribing to fresh foreign loans. It is, nevertheless, difficult to avoid the conclusion that recent events must lead to a revival of a carefully controlled and essentially selective foreign loan business from which international banking is bound to derive much profit. In retrospect, therefore, the fall of the gold bloc is likely to mark an important milestone in the history of international banking.

Roosevelt's Vote Largest Ever To Candidate In US

by yielding to demands certain to come from his labor and political radical supporters, should definitely alienate the Southern conservatives who stood by him in the election, party majorities in Congress would disintegrate. The same thing will be true if, by refusing those demands, he should produce a third party led by labor and the Western radicals. Among possibilities like these, and on the data of Tuesday, a conservative party honestly and intelligently led, and declining to repeat the sham tactics of 1936, has a large place in the political sun.

Examining the election figures of the past, it will be seen that for a President to get more votes for a second term than for a first is not unusual. Jackson, Grant, Cleveland and McKinley had the same experience. (The records before are only electoral.) So did Lincoln and Wilson, but they were first elected by a minority of the voters. But Cleveland increased his vote each of the three times he ran for President, and though he did not get an electoral majority in 1888, he had a larger popular vote than Harrison. Yet after Cleveland the Republicans came to power for a period of sixteen years, followed—after eight—by another period of 12 years.

Broken Records of Tuesday

In the number of States won and in the size of his vote and popular majority the President's performance of Tuesday stands out in American history as a record-breaker. But the number of States carried is the mere working of the constitutional system. Were there no "Electoral College," Mr. Landon, with nearly 18 million votes, would have seemed to run much closer, and a more forthright and better-managed Republican candidate would unquestionably have done so, in this writer's opinion. But the system exists, and the other point is a matter of personal view. Therefore it is more illuminating to turn to the purely factual matter of vote-ratio to demonstrate that Mr. Roosevelt's victory was not as overwhelming as it appears.

Jackson defeated J. Q. Adams in 1828, and Clay in 1832, by the same ratio—6 to 5. Grant, in 1868, beat Seymour only 10 to 9, but four years later he won over Greeley, 5 to 4. Cleveland, only a fraction above even against Blaine in 1884, had a winning ratio of 11 to 10 in 1892. In McKinley's two races against Bryan (1896 and 1900) he got 7 votes increased his popular vote. In 1923 the Hoover-Smith ratio was 4+ to 3. In 1932, when Mr. Roosevelt retired Mr. Hoover, it was 3+ to 2. This year Mr. Landon went down, 14½ to 9. But, while the President added more than 6 millions to his popular vote of 1932, Mr. Landon added about 3 millions to the ballots cast for Mr. Hoover.

There is no doubt that the President is the firm choice of the people in forty-six States as Chief Executive of the country. But to the Democratic party the voters Tuesday said nothing resembling the word "forever."

Spain's Civil War Interests Mexic

Maneuvers Of Spanish Force Interest Citizens More Than Own Affairs

The Spanish war has seized and held firmly the imagination of the people of Mexico, even more than the American presidential election; and it is on Spain, rather than on Washington, that Mexico waits for an indication of her own political future.

Shop windows display maps of Spain dotted with little colored flags. In the cinemas, when the news reels depict scenes from the Spanish front, a storm of cheers and counter-cheers reveals the depth of feeling in the partisans of either side. This is due not merely to the racial and cultural affinity of a former colony with its mother country. The Mexican people feel themselves divided by the same rift of political opinion that has made a battlefield of Spain.

Both countries are essentially poor, and from time immemorial their inhabitants have had to struggle for bare existence, or for what to an agricultural people is synonymous with a bare existence, land. When Mexico was colonized the system of haciendas, or great estates, was transferred to the New World, the communial plots of the Indian villages, despite the protective laws of the Spanish Crown, being gradually absorbed by the colonists. This encroachment led to growing friction between peasant and landlord and was one of the principal causes of the Mexican revolution. In Spain rather similar historical and geographical factors have been at work. Agrarian reform, alike in principle to legislation now in force in Mexico, was one of the main planks in the platform of the Frente Popular.

The Army's Decision

The Spanish and Mexican revolutions cannot be explained entirely in terms of land. Land hunger is but one manifestation of a virulent social struggle between the "haves" and the "have-nots," due to the absence partly of a large middle class and partly of democratic traditions. In these two lands of extreme opinion the issue could only be resolved by force of arms, and in Spain, as formerly in Mexico, the people have grouped themselves in two distinct camps, says the Times, London. The Army is therefore supremely important. In Spain it has supported the vested interests. In Mexico it went over to the revolutionary side, and in consequence the Left secured an easy victory and has been dominant here ever since.

Conditions are now in Mexico such as would inevitably have come about in Spain had the Popular Front been able to pursue its policies in peace. The supporters of General Franco can see in Mexico most of their worst fears realized, while in General Franco's movement the Mexican Conservative sees a long-coveted ambition. For nearly a quarter of a century the reactionary elements in Mexico have sat back, watching their wealth, power, and prerogatives slip through their fingers. Most of the great estates have been divided among the peasants, the Church possesses but a shadow of its former power, and even the industrialists, among which figure the large foreign interests, are hard put to it to make both ends meet. There is constant labor agitation, directed by strong unions and backed by a partisan Government.

Ambitious Generals

In spite of a theoretically democratic Constitution, most Mexican Governments in the past have been established, not by popular vote, but by the time-honored cuartelazo, or military uprising. The more frequent the cuartelazos the faster the plums of office circulate and the greater the number of satisfied generals. In recent and more settled years times have thus been bad for the generals. It is hard to believe that there are not still among them many ambitious spirits of the old school, whose personal aspirations would be fanned to fever heat if they saw the Spanish generals of the Right raised to the highest offices of the State.

The hopes of the Conservatives rise with every victory of the Right in Spain. The Mexican Government appears to hesitate. The labor leaders and agitators advocate advance. But ahead, although still distant, lies Communism, implying many risks, not least of which is the possibility of hostile action from Washington. President Roosevelt has proved himself to be a particularly mild and good neighbor, but even his friendliness might be stretched too far, should there arise a real Communistic threat to the large American business interests established in Mexico. If Governor Landon is successful in the Presidential elections, the curbing influence of Washington would presumably be infinitely stronger.

Britain Favors Arms Control

Assailing Munitions Industry, Royal Board Asks Rigid Curbs

By FERDINAND KUHN Jr.

LONDON, Oct. 31.—Rigid State control of the private armament industry is unanimously recommended by the Royal Commission under the chairmanship of Sir John Eldon Banks, whose report was issued today after twenty months of painstaking labor.

The report came out flatly against nationalization of the industry, but was far from being the "whitewashing" document that the public expected when the commission was appointed. It recommended far-reaching curbs upon the profits and trade practices of private manufacturers of armaments, and it demanded conscription of industry in wartime so that "no one should be allowed to make profit from war."

Reminding the directors of armament concerns that their business was different from ordinary commercial transactions, the commission held them largely to blame for public agitation against the private arms industry in Britain and other countries, it was reported to the New York Times.

"Cynical Language" Decried

"The frivolous and cynical language which some of them have used in their speeches at shareholders' meetings and which has also been disclosed in correspondence examined by the American (Nye) committee," the report said, "has given great and legitimate offense to an immense number of persons, and is largely responsible for the importance given to the scandalous side of the question in the public mind."

The report cleared British concerns of the charges of having fomented war scares and of having pushed the British Government into "warlike" policies. But it censured an unnamed British armaments concern because one of its agents had offered a £50,000 bribe for war orders, ostensibly to a high military official in a foreign country. The country was Rumania, it was reported tonight. The bribe was not paid, but, according to the commission, "the system which enables bribery to be cloaked under commissions and leaves principles free to profess ignorance of it seems to us to be open to grave objections."

New Ministry Advocated

To keep the arms industry free of abuses and to increase its usefulness to the national defense, the commission insisted that a new department of the government must be created under a responsible Minister. Thus it furnished timely ammunition for Winston Churchill and an increasing number of other Members of Parliament who demand establishment of a Ministry of Supply to control and expedite Britain's present gigantic rearmament effort.

"The government should assume complete responsibility for the arms industry in the United Kingdom," the commission declared, "and should organize and regulate the necessary collaboration between the government and private industry. This responsibility should be exercised through a controlling body presided over by a Minister responsible to Parliament and having executive powers in peace time and war time over all matters relating to supply and the manufacture of arms and munitions, costing and authorization of orders from abroad."

Wartime Practice Favored

In effect the commission proposed the revival in peace time of the Ministry of Munitions, which Britain accepted under the stress of the World War, but without which the war might not have been won. The proposed new department would have charge of all those plans of emergency expansion that are causing such bickering between the government and manufacturers at the present time.

"We are of the opinion," the commission declared, "that the administration of the system of licensing exports of arms should be governed by an outlook different from and more positive in character than now prevails * * * and, in particular, that rigid control be exercised over all exports of aircraft, whether classified as military or civil."

Finally, the commission recommended "complete cessation of the private export trade in surplus and second-hand arms and munitions of war." This is a branch of the arms traffic that has been shown at hearings of the Nye committee in Washington and of the Royal Commission here to have been one of the worst sources of mischief in the present system.

Hiring of Ex-Officers Opposed

The commission also declared that it "cannot regard as satisfactory the position under which armament firms are free to recruit ex-officials and ex-officers of the army, navy and air force at their own discretion and cannot ignore the suspicions which arise from this practice, however ill-founded they may be."

"We therefore recommend that officers, whether serving or retired, should not enter the service of armament firms in any capacity without specific approval of the Minister in charge of the department," the commission went on. "We make this recommendation not because we think the practice is likely to be abused but in order that any public anxiety regarding its continuance may as far as possble be allayed."

Throughout its long report the commission was careful not to antagonize that large section of public opinion that opposes the whole system of private armaments manufacture. If the commission differed with advocates of nationalization it did so gently and with the utmost respect for their opinions.

System Is Blamed

It suggested, for example, that much of the public abhorrence of armament concerns was in reality abhorrence of war. The report argued that although armaments had much to do with the catastrophe in 1914, the blame should not be laid on private manufacturers, but on the system of unregulated competition in national armaments. And in an eloquent passage the commission called for unceasing efforts by the British Government to achieve international limitation of armaments so that there would be no incentive for arms manufacturers to bribe foreigners, twist public opinion and create a "fear market" on which their companies could flourish.

Cabinet's Course in Doubt

It remains to be seen whether the present government will follow the commission's recommendations. There is no legal compulsion to accept the proposals of this or any other Royal Commission, although such reports always become standard guidebooks and sources of references in Parliament and on public platforms. But it will not be easy for the government to pigeonhole this report, for there is a rapidly growing conviction in Parliament that the present system must be made to work better, in the interests of national defense.

It is possible, therefore, that this committee, which was a butt of jokes in its early days, has charted the typically British course of reforming an existing institution instead of scrapping it.

Smigly-Rydz Made Poland's Leader

allowing M. Witos, their leader, who has been a fugitive from justice since 1930, to return to Poland; but even the staunchest adherents of liberal democracy would recoil at the possibility of Poland becoming a cockpit for fratricidal struggles in so highly charged an international atmosphere.

To a German publicist in Poland who recently wrote that "the Government has power and nothing else" it might be proper to reply that power, and power which is not despotic, is much to be preferred to chaos. There are many even who wish that Marshal Smigly-Rydz, who was educated in the arts and who is by temperament far more of an English Liberal than a Continental dictator, had some of "the Old Marshal's" thunder and fury. He has not seized power; he has accepted the mantle of Pilsudski in what he and the Government consider to be the national interest.

Italy To Increase Navy by 40,000

Fleet Will Be Developed And Expanded To Meet British Threat In Mediterranean

ROME, Oct. 31.—Italy plans to increase its navy personnel from 50,000 to 100,000 men to meet any British threat in the Mediterranean, authoritative sources reported today.

The fleet also will be developed and expanded, these persons declared. Both moves will be attempts to keep pace with Great Britain's naval rearmament, it was said.

Naval sources said that, following the recent increase in the navy personnel from 50,000 to 60,000 and Premier Benito Mussolini's statement that "several scores of warships are now under construction," the navy was taking these steps:

1. Many light warships are being added to two 35,000-ton battleships now being constructed, the Littorio and the Vittorio Veneto. Ten new submarines have been completed.

2. A strong naval base has been finished on the island of Elba, not far from France, in the Mediterranean, and another will be built at Taranto in Southern Italy.

Navy at Full Strength

3. The navy is being kept at full strength, although the land forces were reduced after the Ethiopian war, during which they reached a total of 1,200,000 men.

When the British home fleet entered the Mediterranean during the tension over the Italo-Ethiopian War, Italy realized that by keeping her fleet "at a certain ratio" with Britain's "she could keep the British from striking," a naval source said, to the New York Times.

"Now she intends to maintain that ratio," this source added. "As the British build, Italy will build. The ratio will remain the same and the British fleet in the Mediterranean will be stymied."

He pointed out that Italy, because of her smaller fleet, does not have to build as much as Great Britain to maintain the ratio.

Anglo-Italian Strain Renewed

Relations between Rome and London have again become strained in recent months. After Italy's conquest of Ethiopia and the abolition of sanctions against that country by the League of Nations the situation in the Mediterranean was eased by the withdrawal of the larger part of the British Fleet from the vicinity of the Suez Canal. Efforts were made to patch up the quarrel, and the British for a time supported the Italian effort to have Ethiopia expelled from the League.

Sir Samuel Hoare, the First Lord of the British Admiralty, however, stirred Italian feeling again when he made a tour of the Mediterranean and returned to London to announce that his country would not abandon its position in the Mediterranean, but would proceed to reinforce the fleet and air forces until it could take care of that "lifeline" of the empire.

He was accused by the Italian press of having spent much of his time on his tour trying to cement a coalition against Italy which should include Turkey, Greece and Yugoslavia, as well as France. The visit of King Edward VIII last Summer to the Adriatic and Aegean Seas was also interpreted in Rome as having been not a holiday but a political tour with the same object in view.

Italy has specialized in fast cruisers and smaller ships and in submarines.

White Star Line.

Former Ban Removed

These plans were not allowed to come to fruition, the Government discouraging the project on the grounds that it involved competition with the Government-supported Cunard merger company.

Later it was unofficially announced that this ban had been removed, too late, however, for the proposed vessels to be acquired for Major Bustard's purpose.

At the time Major Bustard, in an interview with the Monitor, declared that he was starting off on a new tack, proposing to build ships in England to carry his traffic, and that he believed the Government would put no more difficulties in his way.

"We are not going to try to take a share in the present attenuated traffic," he said. "We do not want to take away passengers from other lines. We are catering for an entirely new traffic."

Since then Major Bustard has continued with his plans. His company will make an official statement when the contract for the two liners has been signed.

"Facts now available show," he told a Monitor correspondent recently, "that transport can be organized to cater for a mass market, a lower-paid market than is usually considered, just as big stores, cafes and motorcar firms do with success."

Increase in All Classes

A survey of latest figures for shipping traffic over the Atlantic show that total traffic, east and west, for the period January to October, has increased by 17 per cent this year against the same period last year.

Third class traffic has increased by 21 per cent, tourist by 11.8 per cent, and first class by 18.5 per cent. The greatest increase is in the numbers carried eastward. These have increased by 18 per cent. Here third class passengers have numbered 22.7 per cent more than during the corresponding period in 1935. First class have increased by 20.4 per cent. Westbound third class traffic has bettered by 10 per cent and first class by 16.5 per cent.

Opinion in shipping circles here is that the new line is assured of Government good will in that it will aid employment, give assistance to British shipbuilding yards, strengthen the mercantile marine and provide two vessels especially useful in time of emergency by reason of their modest tonnage, speed and large carrying capacity.

Hilarity

"Every time I look at that hat of yours, Mary, I have to laugh.

"Then I'll leave it where you can see it when the bill arrives."

ST. ANDREW'S BALL

Mr. Hugh MacLean, president of the St. Andrew's Society, and Mrs. MacLean were host and hostess at the St. Andrew's Ball given Monday at the New Grand Hotel. Before the Ball they entertained at a dinner at their home in Negishi. Among those invited were the British Ambassador and Lady Clive, the Canadian Minister and Mrs. Bruce, the Swiss Minister and Mrs. Thurnheer, Sir George and Lady Sansom, Mr. and Mrs. E. R. Dickover, Miss V. Clive, Mr. H. Ashley, Mr. T. G. Ely, president of the St. George's Society, and Mrs. Ely, Mr. Richard Fyfe Boyce, president of the Washington Society and Mrs. Boyce and Mr. and Mrs. W. E. Gooch.

At the Ball two eightsomes and one foursome were danced. The music for these was played by Mr. and Mrs. W. Blundell, Mrs. Blundell at the piano and Mr. Blundell playing the violin. There were an unusual number of kilts and ladies with their tartans. Two of the eightsome sets were kilted and were extremely effective. At supper haggis was served, first being carried in in the usual Highland custom. Telegrams of greeting and good wishes were exchanged between various St. Andrew's Societies in the East.

A large number of people were present at the Ball, many of them having given buffet supper parties before it. In all about 350 invitations were issued.

HUNGARIAN ARTISTS GIVE EXHIBITION

The Hungarian artists, Mrs. Sass Brunner and Miss Elizabeth Brunner will give a Christmas exhibition of oil paintings in the Pine Room of the Imperial Hotel today and Wednesday. The exhibition is open from 9 a.m. to 9 p.m. on both days.

Company's Views Explained

Dr. Eckener's conversations with Secretary Roper and other government officials had nothing to do with the possibility of an "alliance," a representative of the Zeppelin company said recently. The German airship company head, however, is seeking the cooperation of the Commerce Department in establishing an airship line across the North Atlantic on a permanent basis. Before that is accomplished the Commerce Department must rule on the fitness of the airships to be used, and agreements must be obtained from Germany permitting the use of terminal facilities in Germany for American airships.

According to the law governing international aircraft flying over the territory of the United States a reciprocal arrangement must be reached between the country from which the aircraft comes and the United States. That arrangement, however, will not be made by Dr. Eckener but through the regular channels, such as the State Department in this country and the Foreign Office in Berlin.

Iraq Establishes New Government

A Coup D'Etat Made Possible Overthrow Of Old Regime For New

BAGHDAD, Nov. 6—The Minister for Foreign Affairs in the new Cabinet, Dr. Naji al Asil, in conversation yesterday gave an outline for The Times of the circumstances which led to the change of Cabinet last week and the way in which it was brought about. The Minister also gave some indication in general terms of the future domestic policy of the Cabinet, dealt with the bearing of the recent coup d'Etat on the constitutional position of the Ministry, and, lastly, surveyed the position of the Ministry, and, lastly, surveyed the position of Iraq towards her ally Great Britain and her neighbors.

Before the fall of the Hashimi Cabinet, he said, the country had been seething with discontent, a significant indication of which had been the five tribal risings which had marked its tenure of office. The Army found itself in consequence all too frequently at war with its own friends and brothers. National discontent had been at fever heat not only among the tribes but also in the towns, as the Hashimi Cabinet had brooked no opposition and had refused to tolerate the existence of Opposition parties.

Many tribes which had undoubted grievances had been unable to obtain redress, and the whole country had been suffering from a sense of bitter disillusionment, as General Yasin el Hashimi had come into power with a great reputation as a national leader and the country had had great expectations from his Administration. After 18 months of it the people felt that they had gained nothing and were disappointed and resentful, says the Times, London.

Dr. Naji al Asil said that he was aware that there had been unfavorable comment abroad on the action taken by General Baqir Sidqi, but in Iraq the public felt only gratitude towards the Army, for they knew that their deliverance could not have come about in any other way. The revolt had been as nearly bloodless as possible.

General Jafar's Death

The Minister went on to refer to the death of General Jafar el Askari, about which he said there appeared to be serious misapprehensions abroad.

On October 29, when the troops were marching on the capital and the immediate outlook was very serious, the King had wished to send one of his own Aides-de-Camp with a letter to meet the advancing forces to inform them that the Hashimi Cabinet had resigned and that the advance should cease. General Jafar el Askari had intimated to his Majesty that he himself desired, as Minister of Defense, to take the letter to the troops. Twice his Majesty had warned him against taking such a serious step, pointing out its obvious danger, but the General could not be dissuaded. He set out almost alone to confront an Army in open revolt against the Cabinet of which he was a member. The result, however regrettable, had not been unforeseen, and the world should know that General Jafar el Askari had been expressly warned against going.

Soon after the General's departure on this perilous mission Rustam Haidar, the King's Chamberlain, called on Seyyid Hikmat Sulaiman with a letter from the King asking him to form a new Cabinet. On handing over the letter the Chamberlain mentioned that the General had left the capital to confront the advancing troops.

"On hearing this," said Dr. Naji al Asil, "Seyyid Hikmat Sulaiman showed the greatest concern and emotion and obviously entertained the greatest fears as to the safety of the General and informed the Chamberlain that he could not begin to form a Cabinet at a moment of such acute anxiety. He suggested that the General should be hurriedly recalled to Baghdad, but this course was impracticable. Probably by that time the General was already dead as the troops did not know that the Cabinet had resigned nor that the General was carrying a letter from the King. If one of the King's Aides-de-Camp had taken the letter all would have been well."

The Minister then said that everybody hoped that the development of Iraq would proceed on constitutional lines and that it would never again be necessary for the Army to intervene. General Baquir Sidqui did not wish to take part in politics. He was a soldier, and would have his hands full with the great task of building up the Army to the strength required by the national needs.

Moreover, said the Minister, owing to the feelings of friendship and confidence existing between General Siddi and other senior Army officers and the new Prime Minister, the Army would gladly leave the direction of political affairs to his Cabinet. The members of that Cabinet were equally inspired by constitutional ideals, and had taken office because they thought it to be their duty to do so at a time of national crisis, but he was sure that he was speaking for all his colleagues when he said that each of them would gladly relinquish office when his work could be done better by someone else.

Future Policy

The Cabinet's domestic policy would be inspired by its fundamental belief that there should be equal rights and equal justice for all Iraqis, whether Moslems, Jews, or Christians, irrespective of their descent—Arab, Kurdish, or Turkish.

With regard to foreign policy the Cabinet had every desire to maintain the friendliest relations and closest cooperation with Great Britain, and hoped also to strengthen the ties of friendship between Iraq and Turkey, which in recent years had been particularly helpful and sympathetic towards this country.

It hoped also to reach an early and definite settlement of outstanding differences with Persia (Iran), so that Iraqis and Iranis could start on a new footing of complete friendship and cooperation in economic affairs and other matters of mutual interest. With reference to Saudi Arabia the Minister said that he was to leave Baghdad for Ryadh to-morrow with the ratification papers of the new treaty of friendship between Iraq and the Wahabi King's dominions. He hoped that this treaty would result in closer friendship and remove all possible causes of friction.

The people of Iraq were greatly concerned as to the future welfare of Palestine. In this connection the new Cabinet regarded as its starting point King Ghazi's recent telegram to the Higher Arab Committee in Jerusalem. It desired to see justice done to the Palestinian Arabs without injustice to anyone else. It entertained the friendliest feelings towards Syria, and hoped that she would find peace and happiness in the new treaty recently concluded with France. In general Iraq desired to be a source of strength and help to all Arab countries, and the new Cabinet thought that the best means to that end was to build Iraq into a strong and self-reliant State.

Goering Defiant Of 'Foreign Fist'

Plan To Make Third Reich Self-Sufficient Forced On Her By Powers, He Tells Rally

By OTTO D. TOLISCHUS

BERLIN, Oct. 28—What was described as the opening gun in the execution of Chancellor Adolf Hitler's second Four-Year Plan was fired by Col. Gen. Hermann Goering tonight in an impassioned speech in the Sportpalast. He appealed to the entire German people to work together in the common cause even at the price of temporary sacrifices and uttered dire threats against all daring to interfere with the new aim.

The first Four-Year Plan, General Goering said, achieved Germany's armament freedom, created a new German army and restored Germany to the rank of a big power, besides abolishing unemployment and saving agriculture from ruin. The second Four-Year Plan, he said, must achieve Germany's economic independence and his special task, he explained, was to coordinate all the forces in a common cause.

General Goering paid, significantly enough, equal tribute to both Dr. Hjalmar Schacht, head of the Reichsbank, and Dr. Schacht's opponent, Wilhelm Keppler, Hitler's economic adviser, for what has been achieved so far. But he emphasized that much greater things must still be achieved, and though he admitted that he was no economic expert he emphasized that he had the will and a "passionate heart to carry the new plan through even better than contemplated."

To Break "Foreign Fist"

There was rousing applause when he exclaimed:

"We must prevent that fist from abroad from grabbing at our throat. We will break this fist during the next four years finger by finger. We know that others begrudge us our place in the sun. But we shall not capitulate," it was reported to the New York Times.

The new plan, he insisted, was forced on Germany and Germany would gladly renounce it if a crazy world would permit her to do so. But the outside world, he said, had no reason to reproach Germany for wanting to have her share of this world's riches and should be thankful that through the Four-Year Plan Germany was trying to equalize, in a peaceful way, what has been kept from her.

"Our colonies have been stolen from us," he exclaimed amid thunderous applause, "Our gold has been stolen from us. Germany was bled white by reparations. Then came the Chosen People and plundered Germany through the inflation. It is bitter mockery to say 'Why don't you buy your raw materials?'. Give us back our gold and we shall.

Attacks Foreign Journalists

"Britain has one-third of the world as her colonies. We have nothing. If we had only a fraction of these colonies we would not need to talk about raw materials or food shortages."

He turned against those foreign journalists who write about a food shortage in Germany and told them they had better write about Russia, Spain and the rest of the world where "unrest, democracy, communism, anarchy, destruction, robbery and murder prevail." Thereupon he admitted that an occasional "tension" in the supply of foodstuffs did exist because human wisdom had failed so far to make hens lay eggs or cows give milk in equal quantities the year around.

He assured the German nation that at the moment the German cupboard perhaps was somewhat empty but that even in a half-year there would be much more than today. Nobody would ever starve in Germany, he promised, and told the people that if meat was unavailable at the moment to eat fish or whale-oil margarine now produced with Germany's growing fishing and whaling fleet. It is a sin to try to buy what is not there, he told the German hausfrauen.

The applause was meager at this point, but it rose to a new crescendo when he began to denounce as "crooks, thieves and parasites" the profiteers, bootleg traders and the people withholding goods from the market when the fixed prices did not suit them.

"I will ruthlessly exterminate these," he shouted, "ruthlessly and with Draconic measures."

The present sacrifices, he said, were necessary to make the Four-Year Plan possible, and he appealed to all to follow the orders willingly and accept and be proud of the new things the plan will present. He spoke of huge factories to be erected, of German coal that will produce everything from benzine to sweet-smelling soap, of German mineral resources that must still be found under German soil and of the light metals that will replace the metals Germany cannot produce.

No word was said about how these projects are to be financed, but he appealed to all classes to cooperate—inventors and scientists to make new discoveries, to entrepreneurs to use the individual initiative they have always wanted but to think of the people not of profits, to the German workers to maintain calm and order ever if wage improvement was out of the question at the moment, to the peasants to increase their production and to the hausfraus to avoid wasting anything.

"Only the Chosen People get manna from above," he said. "We must depend on our own strength. Show you are a great people. Be worthy of Adolf Hitler."

The speech followed a meeting of National Socialist district leaders and the Ministerial Council attended by Hitler and almost the entire Cabinet at which measures necessary for executing the Four-Year Plan were discussed. Most of the district leaders, except Hitler, also attended the Sportpalast rally which was broadcast over all German radio stations.

But if any definite plan or measures already had been decided on they were not revealed in General Goering's speech.

California Defeated By Washington State

N. Y. Times

BERKELEY, Calif., Oct. 31.—Washington State gained a 14-13 football victory over the University of California today with a touchdown and conversion in the last minute of play.

Twenty-five thousand spectators were kept on edge from the opening gun by the Cougars' spectacular aerial attack. The climax came as California seemed certain to win.

Ed Goddard hurled a pass to Klumb for 23 yards to California's 21. Then on a similar play, Washington State was given the ball on California's 4, when interference with the passer was ruled. On fourth down, Goddard plunged over. George Rowswell was rushed in and made the place kick which decided the contest.

The line-up:

Pos.	Wash. State (14)	California (13)
L.E.	Terry	Dolman
L.G.	Jones	R. Hanford
C.	S. Smith	Herwig

New Roads Are Studied

Federal Proving Ground Tests Materials For Modern Speed Era

By FRANK GEORGE

Although greater progress has been made in road building in the last ten years than in the preceding twenty, more yet is required. Government highway officials estimate that close to 27,000,000 motor vehicles are now on the highways and that there may be 3,000,000 more by 1940. Accordingly, government engineers are preparing for future requirements.

Besides doing research in highway design, they are making extensive studies of low-cost types of construction. They operate near Alexandria, Va., a proving ground where all sorts of road materials are tested to destruction. They are trying to discover how flexible types of road surfacing act in supporting traffic loads. They are investigating the effect of the chemical composition of Portland cement on the durability of concrete, it was reported to the New York Times.

Laboratory studies are being made, too, of the properties of asphalt cements, tars, emulsions and other liquid asphaltic materials. Low-cost mixtures containing liquid bituminous materials are being tested on small circular tracks to determine their resistance to weathering.

Experimental Cotton Roads

Other research deals with the testing of low-cost soil roads, road drainage systems and the hitherto neglected subject of the surface chemistry of soils. The use of soap as an electrolyzer in coating soil with bituminous material is being investigated.

So-called cotton roads are being promoted chiefly in an effort to find new uses for cotton. The oldest known experimental "cotton road" was built in South Carolina in 1926—200 feet on Route 2, between Chapin and Prosperity. Similar test strips have been laid in Texas, Louisiana, Georgia, New Jersey and Mississippi, but results have been inconclusive either as to durability or low maintenance cost. To settle the question, 600 miles of bituminous-surfaced roads reinforced with cotton are being built for test purposes in twenty-four States under projects sponsored by the Agricultural Adjustment Administration.

Weather-Resistant Types

In "cotton roads" the cotton fabric is simply a filler between layers of bituminous material. It is laid over a bituminous priming coat on top of a graded and surfaced road bed and covered with a bituminous coating containing crushed mineral aggregate. The bituminous material penetrates the open mesh and covers the individual yarns. The road is rolled, and another bituminous coating applied. Into this, a layer of "chips" is rolled.

Much of the government research deals with weather-resistant types of road construction, since weather—not heavy traffic—is the chief destroyer of roads. A thin coating of concrete will stand up for years under the pounding of the heaviest sort of traffic; but Jack Frost can wreck a road with a few icy breaths. The government effort is to find ways to minimize frost damage by stabilizing treatments of the soil.

Motorists in this year of unprecedented tourist travel have observed the improved condition of Eastern highways. From Maine to Florida, from the Mississippi River to the Atlantic Seaboard, the traffic is moving faster, much faster.

Roads have been widened, curves lengthened, grades reduced, sight distances increased, express routes put through cities, and by-passes around cities. The complete program calls for a network of mile-a-minute roads between and around all Eastern centers of population.

Mile-a-Minute Straightaways

Highway officials no longer talk much of leveling "turtleback" roads and building shoulders on roads that are too narrow, but of mile-a-minute straightaways. Highways built for thirty-five and forty mile an hour traffic are considered unsafe. Even trucks are travelling faster than that.

By mile-a-minute highways, the government officials mean two-lane highways with a sight distance of at least 1,000 feet from almost any point along the route, and four-lane highways with parkways between opposing traffic lanes. The latter type has been constructed in parts of Delaware, New Jersey, Connecticut and Massachusetts; its extension and adoption by other States are being sought.

New ways are being sought to provide safe intersections on all maintravelled roads. Germany, in a national program of highway development, is trying to solve this problem by bridging the main highways. Equal results at less cost, say the United States engineers, can be obtained by means of clover-leaf intersections and circles or by means of parkway intersections into which the crossroads are gradually curved.

How China Receives Motion Pictures

Films Appeal To Chinese; Tragedies And Melodrama Most Popular

Dr. Lim Yutang, Chinese philosopher, writer and author, has written the following appraisal of the motion picture in China at the request of the New York Times.

The Chinese people, who so love the theater and who would fall for any sort of entertainment, are falling for the movie today. This is true not only of the treaty ports, but even of the inland cities, where American movie pictures are making the same inroads the kerosene lamp made three decades ago. Jeanette MacDonald has become the popular screen idol, and young people are playing "The March of the Grenadiers" on their harmonicas at camping parties in the way people used to sing Peking operatic airs from the "Three Kingdoms" at public baths. Many college girls are more familiar with the respective age and domestic life of American stars than with names from Chinese history. A street peddler with Shirley Temple postcards always does a roaring business before schools at luncheon hours.

With the Chinese hearty enjoyment of life, this movie-mindedness has struck not only the young, but the old as well. I have often seen old people attending a movie picture with the assistance of their young daughters, who explain to them what is being said in the English dialogue.

With this great public demand for pictures, a native Chinese motion picture industry has sprung into being. Excellent as the American pictures are, the characters and the social background lack familiarity for the majority of the Chinese audience. It is amazing how modern screen technique has made it possible for people ignorant of the English tongue to follow intelligently a story, which almost proves that language is a superfluous invention. But, nevertheless, the audience likes to hear the familiar tones and phrases of their native tongue with the picture. So the coming of the sound pictures has greatly helped in creating a still greater demand for native pictures, and dozens of Chinese cinema companies sprung into existence.

Throughout the country and in Chinese colonies overseas there has come a great demand for Chinese-made pictures, greater than the resources of the motion picture companies can meet. The mandarin, the national language of China, which is spoken over nine-tenths of the country, is the common medium, while pictures in the Cantonese dialect are made for the Cantonese and overseas market.

Thus, in time, an entirely indigenous industry grew, following the American lead and using American machines, but produced with Chinese capital, Chinese technicians, producers and actors. There are now about thirty to forty Chinese feature players, with about a dozen male and female stars, about whom Chinese movie fans behave generally in the same manner as American fans. Picture postcards of stars are sold everywhere, and an album of pictures of Miss Butterfly Hu, who enjoys the longest established popularity, is said to have sold a hundred thousand copies. Next to Butterfly Hu, who went to the Moscow Movie Exhibition with Mei Lan Fang last February on the invitation of the Russian Government, are Chen Yenyen, the beloved little debutante who appears in "The Song of China," Li Chocho, Lin Ch'uch'u, Yuan Meiyun and others.

The technique and tempo of Chinese pictures are slightly different from the American. Expression of emotions is done more often by silent facial gestures than by impetuous talking or acting, and Chinese actors habitually underact, as American players of Chinese roles habitually overact. There is also a slower tempo, consonant with Chinese life and literature, more dwelling on little incidents and less hastening forward to the climax.

The Chinese are an extremely emotional people, reveling in tragedies and in downright melodrama. What they love most is a melodramatic tragedy woven around a theme of family love. The two American pictures that have made the greatest hit in China and are forever remembered are "Way Down East" and "Over the Hill." Weeping is no sin in China; Chinese men and women have always enjoyed a good hearty cry on their ancestors' graves every Easter anyway, and besides, the art of wiping one's eyes by a sweeping of the broad sleeve has been ennobled into an artistic gesture on the Chinese opera stage. And so at the movies, too, they enjoy crying to their hearts' content.

Apart from family love, which has always been the central theme of Chinese dramas, the contemporary pictures are showing, for the most part, themes of conflict between the country and the modern city life and the conditions of the farmers and poorer class, and their exploitation by the wealthy and the warlords—as much as they are allowed to by the Nanking censors. This is true of the best-made pictures, like "Humanity," which shows the effects of famine, and "The Fisherman's Song," which portrays a fisherman, who is pressed by the landlord for his rent, goes to fish in a stormy night and is drowned.

The Chinese motion picture industry today stands in the illogical situation of facing a great developing market and public demand with extremely limited financial resources. Two or three years ago, most of the picture companies were tottering through lack of financial backing and inefficient management. Recently, some of the biggest companies have been entirely reorganized and have received a new impetus of life, like the Star Motion Picture Company of Shanghai. Poorly equipped compared with Hollywood, the finished products that Chinese photographers and technicians juggle out of out-of-date machines, with sometimes truly beautiful photographic effects, excite in me always a sense of marvel, like an exquisite melody that a street fiddler coaxes out of a second-rate violin.

Battleship's Uses Upheld by British

Capital Vessels Are Declared To Be Not Immune To Plane Attacks, But Indispensable

No amount of armor can ever make battleships immune from air attack, yet Britain must continue to have them to keep her sea lanes open in time of war. That was the verdict of a British Cabinet committee under Sir Thomas Inskip, Minister for Defense Coordination, which spent months studying the great technical controversy of "bombers versus battleships."

A partial version of the committee's report was issued as a White Paper on November, with many passages withheld from the public for strategic reasons. The committee rode roughshod over the opinions of Admiralty experts, who were sure the future of capital ships could be made safe against fatal damage from bombs, according to the New York Times.

"It is plain to us," the committee reported, "that capital ships cannot be constructed so as to be indestructible by bombing from the air. This probably would be true even if the factors of speed, armament and weight were disregarded in the design of a ship so that the thickness of the defensive armor could be indefinitely increased.

Sees Possibility of Planes

"In circumstances favorable to an attack from the air which could be driven home by a large and powerful force, the most heavily armed capital ship can no doubt be destroyed or at last seriously crippled."

Yet the committee found capital ships indispensable for a great oceanic power like Britain, and by inference it justified the construction of two new £8,000,000 battleships, the King George V and the Prince of Wales, soon to be laid down under the 1936 program.

The work of Britain's capital ships would never be done by airplanes, according to the committee, "while there are large areas of ocean which are out of the range of service aircraft based on British territory." The committee pointed out further that other countries were building giant battleships and "we need ships equal in fighting power to those to which they may be opposed."

To back up this opinion the committee recalled the experiments carried out two years ago by the United States Navy Department and declared:

"Although the American Government is in possession of all the information regarding its own trials it has not thereby been induced to cease building capital ships, as some critics here, on less complete information, would wish us to do."

The only course for Britain, the committee concluded, is to make her battleships as immune as possible from attack by bombing planes.

"We are satisfied," the committee announced, "that everything is being done that experience can suggest or money will provide."

Cites Battleship Cost

A committee on imperial defense reported that it cost as much money to build and maintain a battleship as would be required for forty-three average bombing planes.

The Admiralty does not assert that battleships are invulnerable to air attack, the report said, but that modern improvements in the protection of anti-aircraft gunnery make them at least no more vulnerable to bombing than to gunfire.

The value of anti-aircraft fire, however, is difficult to estimate on the basis of present experiments and further trials are necessary, it was reported.

No details of British tests were given, but the appendix gave published results of United States tests on the battleships New Jersey, Virginia, Washington and the Ostfriesland, a former German warship, and quoted the American official conclusion that battleships were still essential.

Romance In Africa

Natives Still Pay In Cattle For Brides That Parents Hold For C.O.D.

By GEORGE HALLATT

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa.—Said Mafongozana one fine day, "Boss, can Maquet and I have the afternoon off? We want to go and twala a wife for Velechona," and thereby hangs the tale of a native romance in the Eastern Transvaal.

In certain parts of the Eastern Transvaal, the custom of paying "lobola"—that is, the paying of cattle as the purchase price of a wife—shows a tendency to die out among some of the more civilized natives; for, apart from the fact that many get married in the churches, they know that the parents or guardians of the bride have no legal redress if the cattle are not paid up. But it is still the invariable custom among the farm natives.

A native usually pays so many cattle down and the rest in installments. If he does not pay up as quickly as his wife's relatives would like, the wife simply treks home during some absence of her lord and master and refuses to return until he goes to fetch her—beast in hand, so to speak. Some of the native husbands have become wily enough to let their wives remain until the relatives get tired of feeding them; and then, when the wives have given up all hope of being reclaimed, they come meekly tramping back to their husbands. Because of the increasing difficulty of collecting the installments, most of the native parents now insist on C. O. D.—cattle on delivery.

A Matrimonial Quest

Now when Velechona, a native, wanted to take unto himself a wife he appointed his brothers-in-law, Mafongozana and Maquet, to find him one. A previous matrimonial flutter had proved a failure, and when the wife returned to her people, probably in the hope of squeezing out a payment, Velechona shrugged his shoulders and paid no attention to her, beyond going to his "boss," the doctor, requesting that Hlihili (meaning gadabout) had gadded off for the last time and was no longer his wife; would the boss please not supply her with any more free medicine? it was reported to the New York Times.

Mafongozana and Maquet looked round and espied a buxom maiden who, they thought, would be suitable. She was pointed out to Velechona, who agreed that she was strong and capable of doing a good day's hoeing to help with the Velechona family budget.

The girl herself must not be approached on the subject of marriage. It fell to Mafongozana to see the parents and to find out whether Velechona would be acceptable as a son-in-law. That being so, there followed a week of discussion about the number of cattle required as "lobola" and whether the girl was to be delivered at Velechona's hut by her parents, or whether he should be allowed to "twala" her—that is, carry her off.

If the girl is to be delivered, it means that a host of relatives accompany her, and the man who has bought her must entertain them all for two or three days; but, if economy is necessary and the parents are agreeable, the man may "twala" the girl. Having had as much as he could do to gather the necessary five head of cattle demanded, Velechona chose the latter course. Hence the request made by his two agents for an afternoon's leave.

Abducting the Bride

The next act took place when Nomtitili, the chosen maiden, carefree and quite ignorant of all the arrangements made for the future, returned from her work along with a crowd of young girls her own age. Laughing and singing, clapping their hands, they danced down the dusty road to the joyous, if monotonous, strains of a cheap flute.

Blum Forces Out A Havas Director

Guimier, Of French News Agency, Resigns Under Pressure

The French newspaper world had a major sensation on November 4 when Pierre Guimier, the director of the Havas Agency, in charge of advertising, was forced to resign his post under pressure from Premier Leon Blum, according to The New York Times.

The announcement was made in unusual fashion by the publication of two letters. One, written to Mr. Guimier by the Havas council of administration, reluctantly explained that Premier had delivered an ultimatum to the effect that Mr. Guimier must resign or he would force Havas to separate its advertising and news services. The other, written by Mr. Guimier, announced his resignation and bittery attacked Mr. Blum.

Theoretically, Mr. Guimier has been forced out because he publishes the morning newspaper Le Journal and was not supposed to hold both positions, but actually there is far more than appears on the surface.

In popular as well as present governmental quarters, Mr. Guimier represents the great industries and banking interests that are fighting the Popular Front and that hold a powerful grip on a large part of the the Paris press. Premier Blum is setting out to loosen that grip, and he has a whole plan of attack, including a bill that will be introduced in Parliament intended to get at the forces behind newspapers.

The resignation of Mr. Guimier represents the first victory for Mr. Blum in this conflict.

Statement By Havas

The Havas Agency made the following announcement:

Pierre Guimier, director of Le Journal and long a member of the administrative council of the Havas Agency, resigned from the latter organization today.

The resignation followed an exchange of letters between the administrative council and Mr. Guimier, both of which were published in Le Temps.

In its letter the council stated a difficult situation had developed because of Mr. Guimier's presence as a Havas executive.

One of the reforms planned by the Popular Front government involved freeing the French press of any suspicion of constraint by advertisers, it was recalled. Premier Leon Blum was quoted as saying that intentionally or otherwise Mr. Guimier and Le Journal had played an important role in the recent elections and that the objectivity of the Havas news reports might be rendered suspect by his continued presence on the council.

The Premier was further quoted as having pointed out that either Mr. Guimier should leave the Havas Agency or the department with which he was connected, the advertising service, should be completely divorced from the news service.

The problems involved here, the council explained in its letter, had been most carefully examined and it had been decided that breaking the Havas Agency into two companies, one for the news service, another for the advertising service, would result in severe losses for both the stockholders and the employes. They found it expedient to continue as at present with the two departments autonomous but under a common directorate.

Inasmuch as Mr. Guimier had never attempted to use his influence over the news service in any way, the council further explained, it could not demand his resignation without violating its sense of loyalty and solidarity.

In concluding its letter the council urged Mr. Guimier to consider the situation carefully, bearing in mind that his continued association might jeopardize the accrued benefits of a hundred year's work.

"The solution to the problem is in the hands of Mr. Guimier," the letter finished.

In his reply Mr. Guimier protested the attitude of the council and announced his resignation.

Charge Is an Old One

The directors of the Havas Agency have always contended that their news and advertisement services were entirely separate; but the allegation has constantly been made against the agency by the Left parties that it used its power as an advertising agency to control political opinion.

Pierre Guimier, as a close friend of former Premiers Andre Tardieu and Pierre Laval, has been especially open to attack on this account. His political opponents have repeatedly alleged that he sought to influence the political opinion of the newspapers by withholding advertisements from those that were not in agreement with his political opinions and favoring those that were.

No charge has ever been made against the Havas Agency that its news service showed political bias. The complaint on which Premier Blum has acted was exclusively that it used its position as the principal agency for national advertising to the disadvantage of the Left press and in that way of the Left government.

U.S. Navy Asks Men Increase

Rear Admiral Andrews, In His Annual Report, Cites Building Of New Treaty Ships

Increases in both officer and enlisted strength for the American navy were sought recently by Rear Admiral Adophus Andrews, chief of the Bureau of Navigation, according to the New York Times.

In his annual report for the fiscal year ended last June the officer who heads the bureau responsible for manning the fleet said that the navy should have full complements for each of its vessels if adequate provision was to be made for possible emergency.

Admiral Andrews asserted that the average enlisted strength of 88,000 authorized for the present fiscal year would provide sufficient men to man new ships and maintain the average personnel strength of about 85 per cent of full crews for the fleet as a whole.

"While an 85 per cent allowance is sufficient for the peace-time needs of the individual ships," he said, "the total personnel thereby assigned to the fleet is not adequate in number of experienced men for the needs of mobilization.

Bureau's Responsibility Cited

"This bureau's responsibility extends beyond provisions of personnel for the active fleet. It must maintain mobilization plans which contemplate complete manning of useful combatant vessels now in reduced commission, the manning of useful combatant vessels that are decommissioned, and the manning of many auxiliaries that will be obtained from the merchant marine in time of war.

"To provide sufficient trained men, in addition to available Naval Reserves, for the commissioning on mobilization of vessels now out of commission and for other needs of mobilization, vessels of the fleet should be fully manned with complements of war strength. The increase allowed for the year 1937 of the average number of men to 96,500 will provide for the commissioning of new vessels, and will to some degree increase the percentage allowance which can be made to ships of the fleet.

Need of Officers Stressed

"The situation with respect to officer personnel is not as favorable as that with regard to enlisted personnel. Studies indicate that 7,941 line officers are necessary to man fully the treaty navy now authorized and building.

"The legislation enacted by the last Congress increased the authorized line officer strength from 5,499 to 6,531. On June 30, 1936, there were 6,340 line officers, leaving a deficiency of some 1,600 officers below the essential number. This deficiency will be filled in part by detailing to sea duty for a period of three years the successively graduating classes of aviation cadets.

"Other methods of supplying the necessary number of officers are under study by the bureau and are to some degree interrelated with studies now in progress by the general board on the system of promotion in the navy."

Palestine Arabs Turn To Boycott

Business As Well As Political Objectives Are Seen In New Weapon Against Jews

JERUSALEM, Oct. 30—As was expected immediately after the Arab general strike was called off throughout Palestine, an anti-Jewish boycott movement has taken root. If it continues, it will probably become very serious.

The largest part of Palestine's trade has always been in Jewish hands. In recent years all newly created industries have been entirely Jewish. Naturally, Arab purchasers are an important factor to Jewish traders and industrialists. Export to neighboring Arab countries of goods manufactured in Palestine has also been a fair source of revenue to Jewish manufacturers.

In the newly organized anti-Jewish boycott movement its leaders find an excellent opportunity for profitable business. Arab companies are being formed for the sale of such goods hitherto handled entirely by Jews, it was reported to the N.Y. Times.

The Jewish boycott of the Jaffa port serves to aggravate the Arab boycott movement against the Jews. The Jews are eager for their own port Tel-Aviv, for which large sums have been subscribed and work on which is going on at a feverish pace. All efforts of Jaffa Arab port workers to induce Jews to resume use of that port have been in vain. The Jews remain adamant in their determination not to return to Jaffa, even though shipping through Haifa or the temporary jetty at Tel-Aviv is more costly.

Arabs, on the other hand, are doing everything possible to increase the business of the Jaffa port. Local strike committee throughout the country are trying their utmost to induce Arab merchants and importers to order all goods delivered through Jaffa, and orange exporters are urged to ship their produce through Jaffa only.

Jaffa Favored

Arab leaders maintain that to keep the Jaffa port idle means to keep the entire town of Jaffa idle.

Efforts are also being made by the Arabs through political channels to compel Jews to return to the Jaffa port. The Arabs maintain that, according to law, two ports are not permitted within one governmental area. They further contend that Jaffa is the official port of Southern Palestine and that the government has no right to allow a port to be built at Tel-Aviv. Representations on this subject have been submitted by the Arab high committee to the British High Commissioner.

Political leaders among both Arabs and Jews are now busy preparing evidence to submit to the royal commission arriving here Nov. 11. While government circles are vesting great hope in the commission to find a suitable solution of the Palestine problem, experienced observers feel that it is doubtful that the commission's investigations and recommendations will help bring about peace and harmony between the Jews and Arabs in the Holy Land.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

Proof

From a local court report:—

The Registrar: — "Nevertheless, there has been a breach of the Order-in-Council and I have decided I must inflict a penalty. I think I will inflict a penalty to the amount of what you used to pay. You will not be summoned again for non-registering this year." He accordingly fined him $15.

With his hand on his heart and the necessary tremulo of emotion in his voice, In Parenthesis quotes the above as proving that the late Mr. William Shakespeare was perfectly correct in his statement that. "The quality of mercy is a bit thick." Or did he say "not strained"?

"Well, daughter," replied the fond father, "if your heart's set on him, I haven't a word to say, but I always did hope you'd marry an American."

Alaska Has Many Wings

fur mukluks; two suits of woollen underwear, heavy flannel shirt, sweater, fleece-lined trousers and parkha, and he is ready for the bitter cold of an Arctic flight. It is still dark as he walks to the landing field, for he must take every advantage of the scant three hours of daylight. The mercury stands at 45 below and he scans the skies searchingly for any sign of the sudden, fateful blizzards from the Arctic Slope.

At the field he aids his mechanic in drawing the ski-equipped plane from its hangar. A small gasoline stove is set under the engine to thaw the ice-crusted parts. The turgid oil is heated on another stove near by while he carefully checks his engine and instrument board. Half an hour later the stoves are removed and the gasoline and warm oil poured into the ship. There follows a full hour of warming up the engine while he gives a final study to the weather reports sent from various Army Signal Corps stations.

Once in the air, he sees the pale sun partly risen above the bleak mountains in the distance; he knows that it will not rise much further nor shine very long. Endless hills and valleys of white, dotted here and there by brown trees and cut occasionally by bluewhite streams of ice, stretch away beneath him as he wings onward toward the remote mining settlement.

When he lands near the huddled cabins of the tiny village the plane is immediately surrounded by grizzled prospectors, calling cheerful greetings, asking for packages, tobacco and newspapers. There follows an evening spent around the fireplace of the roadhouse, playing cards and spinning tales of the north.

Such is the workaday routine of the Alaska flier. On him depends much of the future of America's northern empire.

Mass Production Of Bombing Planes In Great Britain

Heavy Bombers Manufactured By New Process Of Assembly; Latest Type

The latest heavy bomber built for the R.A.F. was flown recently. It had been finished within a year of the preparation of the drawings, and it is now being produced in quantity and at a high rate by a system verging on that of mass production. On Nov. 8 the first of the type was named the Harrow, and at the time of the naming ceremony a number of its companions were being rapidly assembled in the works of Handley Page, Limited, at Cricklewood.

The Harrow is a big high-wing monoplane, capable of carrying a heavy load of bombs at high speed. Its wing is metal covered; its roomy fuselage has a fabric covering. Two Bristol Pegasus engines, fitted with three-bladed variable-pitch airscrews, are set in the leading edge of the wing. Fixed undercarriage legs depend from the underside of the wing, and the big wheels are covered with fairings. There appear to be gun turrets in the nose, amidships, and aft of the tail unit. The wing has automatic slots on the leading edge and flaps on the trailing edge. It is thus a structure of some complexity and it embodies some constructional features which have not had to be put into production before by this firm.

Metal Skin

Among these is the metal skin of the wing. It is true that this form of wing covering is now an essential in aeroplanes of high performance. It demands more riveting than was necessary with fabric-covered wings, and the smooth surface it is intended to provide requires that the rivet heads shall not protrude. The skin has to be attached to the ribs which make the frame of the wing, and the riveting process is apt to be difficult unless the workmen can get easily at both sides of the plates. The idea of making the skin in sections, attaching it to the internal members in sections and afterwards assembling the sections, turned this from a complicated task into a series of simple tasks. More precise details of the method may not yet be published, but the idea contains the secret of rapid production and has been applied to the making of the whole of the structure of the Harrow.

The result in terms of speed or output or the saving of man-hours is likewise a secret, but it is evident to the most casual visitor to the huge factory, 1,000ft. long that bits and pieces of a big aeroplane are coming into existence and being brought along to successive stages of assembly at a rate which could never have been approached by the old system. In effect the aeroplane's structure has been sub-divided into something near the smallest possible bits. Upon the production of those basic pieces, a sort of progressive system of meccano construction has been built. The pieces flow laterally across the workshop for sub-assembly and the growing frameworks flow down the shop for the principal assembly stages.

The company has received a big order for Harrow heavy bombers and has promised delivery at early dates. A big order has been placed for the H. P. 52 medium bomber, and this too will be produced by the thousand stage method.

Japan Not Dumping Hot-Water Bottles

Domei

WASHINGTON, Dec. 1.—Charges that Japan is dumping rubber hot-water bottles on the United States market were declared unfounded today by Mr. Wayne C. Taylor, Acting Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. Taylor said that investigation and careful consideration of the evidence uncovered proved the dumping charges to be unwarranted.

Revision Campaign Hits Little State

in Yugoslavia is blind enough to imagine that the overweening ambitions of the Maygars would long be content to allow Yugoslavia immunity.

Mussolini has rendered a greater service to the Little Entente than all Mr. Benes's energetic labors that there is not a single Czech or Rumanian who is not convinced that behind the demand for the recovery of the Maygars minorities lies an unspoken determination to recover all the lands of the Crown of Saint Stephen which Hungary lost by the treaty of Trianon, and to resubject the former subject nationalities to the Maygar yoke. Thus the new States are drawing together for self-defense, all recent difficulties fading into the background, it was reported to the New York Times.

Why should Mussolini have thus sacrificed their growing sympathies? From the first date of Italy's rapprochement with Germany, outwardly signalized by the Austro-German accord on July 11, Mussolini's attitude toward Hitler was characterized by the caution of a man playing poker with a stranger rather than by an open-hearted confidence. Until Sunday he seemed desirous of utilizing Balkan fears of Germany to effect at Vienna a rapprochement with the Little Entente which would have strengthened his position vis-a-vis a dangerous partner. Such ideas are made illusory by Mussolini's latest speech.

Divisions of Power

Central Europe sees only one explanation of Il Duce's conduct—that Count Ciano, Italian Foreign Minister, concluded at Berlin a secret agreement dividing Central and Southeastern Europe into two spheres of influence, Austria and Czechoslovakia falling to Germany, the remainder to Italy. The speech certainly has done ill-service to the cause of peace. It will clinch any hesitation on Rumania's part in giving those bigger orders for Czech armaments which the Skoda company hoped for as a result of King Carol's visit to Czechoslovakia: Suspicion of German-Italian partition schemes will redouble the speed of Mr. Benes's construction of a "Maginot line" roughly along the language frontier between the racial Czechs and the German subjects of Czechoslovakia.

Nanking Mission In Hainan For Inspection

Domei

CANTON, Dec. 2—A party of 10 Chinese financial and military experts sent from Nanking to inspect the possibilities of developing economic and communications facilities in Hainan Island, arrived at Hoihou from Canton by airplane at 11 a.m. today.

The special inspection party comprises Admiral Chen Tseh, director of naval matters of the National Military Council, Mr. T. V. Soong, Chairman of the Board of Directors of the Bank of China. The party is also accompanied by General Yu Han-mou, Commander-in-Chief of the Kwantung Army, and Mr. Tseng Yang-pu, Mayor of Canton.

The Chinese officials' travel, to the southern Island, is receiving keen attention from various quarters in view of the recent successful negotiations reportedly concluded by Mr. T. V. Soong with the British authorities in Hongkong for joint exploitation of South China.

The presence of military experts are understood to be connected with important arrangements to strengthen defenses in the southern waters.

Press Prints Roosevelt Speech; Address Hailed

Domei

LONDON, Dec. 2—President Roosevelt's epoch-making speech delivered before the opening session of the Inter-American Peace Conference at Buenos Aires yesterday was printed extensively in all European countries, a survey of press reaction of the Continental States shows here today.

Both the British and French press were loud in praise of the President's address and were especially pleased with the reference that "Democracy is still the hope of the world," while the Italian and German papers omitted Roosevelt's references to "land-hungry and aggressive nations."

League circles interpreted the regional mutual assistance pact as directed against the invader. Officials at Moscow, in commenting upon the speech, said that the President was primarily rapping Italy and Germany as menacing world peace.

Suffern Utopia Still An Infant, But Growing

left his own house, which has reached the second story in places and is not yet roofed—he works on it in spare time—and continued the rounds.

The next lot belongs to Mr. and Mrs. Hiram Merriman. Mrs. Merriman was in the act of moving her furniture into some of the rooms, but took time off to display her house. The walls are of the favored field stone construction, lined inside with a heavy composition board, painted cream color, giving a satisfactory illusion of plaster and very easy to apply. She conducted a tour of the second floor, expressed pride in her copper fire-place hood which acts as a radiator, and then rushed off to the kitchen to try her new dish-washing machine.

The house of Ralph Haefner, a writer, next in line, is at the top of the second hill that gives topographical variety to the forty-acre tract. He had chosen to build his walls with cement blocks having a cork insulation cast into them. The author was not at home, but Mr. Bogle said that he was one of the strongest advocates of the community.

A Small Specimen

James Dahir was found in his living room, dressed in overalls and grinning broadly as he mixed mastic on a barrel-head and prepared to smear it on vulnerable parts of the wall to keep the weather out. His house is the smallest of those so far built, certainly not more than twenty feet by twelve, but surprisingly roomy.

As time was pressing, Mr. Bogle passed over three other houses, all occupied, and in front of one of which the owner's wife, Mrs. R. T. Marquart, was raking leaves among the kale of her vegetable garden, flanked by two huge heads of red cabbage.

In addition to the seven houses now building or built, costing between $1,400 and $5,200 each, and standing on lots of from one to three acres, the Utopians plan two more houses in the spring, for which land has already been leased.

School Is Planned

If the speeches now being given by Mr. Borsodi bring in enough money, they plan also to start work on the School of Living building, which will occupy the center of the tract, and will house courses in weaving, carpentry and the hundred things which these people believe in doing for themselves, thus saving the high cost of distribution.

Britain Edges Out US To Lead In Air Routes

Takes Top Position For First Time With 53,291 Miles, Ministry Reports

LONDON, Oct. 30—During 1935 the British Empire, for the first time, took world leadership in regular air route mileage. The Air Ministry's annual report, recently issued, discloses that Empire routes now in operation have an aggregate length of 53,291 miles compared to 52,461 miles of airways for the United States, which is listed in second place. France flew 24,451 miles of regular air routes, Germany, 22,291 miles, and the Netherlands, 12,998 miles. No figures are cited for the Soviet Union, which in all likelihood ranks third.

Empire Adds 5,000 Miles

Almost every imperial territory in which airline companies are registered contributed to the year's route mileage increase of 26 per cent. Great Britain herself accounted for expansion of 5,000 miles, including all regularly operated internal routes and routes worked overseas solely by Imperial Airways or by other British companies. Canada returned an increase from 5,080 to 6,111 miles; Australia, including New Guinea, advanced from 12,050 to 15,524 miles; South Africa added 800 miles; Southern Rhodesia added 600 miles; Kenya added 700 miles. New Zealand appeared in the table for the first time, with 335 miles of regularly worked air routes, says the N. Y. Herald Tribune.

World route mileage the report assesses at 278,200. It estimates that airline planes flew 150,000,000 miles in 1935, as against approximately 1,000,000 miles in 1919, in which year world air route mileage was no more than 3,200.

Airmails Show Big Increase

Statistics of aerial activity in Britain show that the country is keeping pace with world development. Airmails dispatched abroad showed a big increase; more than 187 tons of letter mails (approximately 1,500,000 letters) left Britain by plane during 1935, as compared with 122 tons (6,000,000 letters) in 1934. Air-borne parcels sent out of the country weighed in the aggregate seventy-nine tons. Last year's Empire Christmas mail was the heaviest ever dispatched from Britain, approximately half a million letters being carried. The report attributes the heavy growth in airmail traffic to reductions in air postage rates on the Empire routes and extensions and duplications of the services.

3 Killed In Tsitsihar Power Plant Explosion

Domei

MUKDEN, Dec. 2—Three Japanese and Manchurians were killed instantly and 35 others were injured when a boiler of an electric power plant at Tsitsihar exploded at 1:45 a.m. The cause of the explosion is believed to be a defect in the safety-valve of the boiler. The damage is estimated at about ¥1,300,000.

The city authorities here were advised that it will take nearly three months to restore the damaged plant to its former state and that electric supply to houses in the city will be impossible for the time being.

New Bid System 'Revolutionizes' Contract Bridge

Columbia Publishes Book With 'Scholarly Approach To Avocational Activity'

A new revolutionary philosophy of contract bridge, which rejects the current emphasis on bidding, based on honor cards held, and substitutes a system of bidding based on an analysis of the numerical distribution of the cards, will be presented to the bridge world by the Columbia University Press.

The book, "The Bissell System," is the bridge philosophy of Harold W. Bissell, an attorney in the firm of Davis, Polk, Wardell, Gardiner & Reed. A bridge devotee for more than twenty years, Mr. Bissell about eight years ago became convinced that, beginning with Whitehead, the authorities had almost completely missed the significance of the early auction methods of bidding, and, consequently, had embarked upon an ill-considered and illogical course of high card exploitation at the expense of elementary principles of distribution.

Four years later he began to develop his idea into a definite system, confident that the earliest and more instinctive methods of auction bridge pointed the way to a more sound bidding, says the N. Y. Herald Tribune.

A recognized bridge expert, the late Louis H. Watson, became interested as soon as he discovered that the Bissell system was really based on distribution. He was sufficiently impressed to induce Edward Hymes jr. to join with him in giving the system an extended trial. At the time of his death he had also interested Charles Lochridge and John Rau in the system and an expert team of four was in the process of being formed.

Columbia Press Approval

The Columbia University Press, publishers of an encyclopedia, scientific treatises and educational thesese, considered the system "a sound, scholarly approach to an avocational activity" and so undertook to present the book to the public.

For its basic principals the Bissell system returns to "earlier and sounder" conceptions which were abandoned before they were understood. In its recognition of the controlling importance of distribution, it is called a vitally new system, although its true source dates back to early auction.

A historical analysis of bidding, which B. Jay, bridge authority of Philadelphia, calls "one of the outstanding masterpieces in the literature of bridge," comprises the introduction to Mr. Bissell's book. Beginning with a few elementary principles of distribution, Mr. Bissell reveals the silent but dramatic part which they have played in the rise and fall of conventions, system and authorities. As the story of these principals unfolds, the distributional method of bidding inevitably and unmistakably takes shape.

Two "Distinct Threads" Noted

Viewed in perspective, the "chaos of the modern battle of systems" is disclosed as an irresistible advance toward a new philosophy of bidding.

"There are two threads running through the era of auction bidding," Mr. Bissell said, "an intuitive thread and a regulative thread. Intuition led toward a separation of opening distributions and pointed the way toward the distributional philosophy of the system here presented. Regulation led to a succession of high-card specifications which eventually involved the world of bridge in a high-card philosophy of the decade now closing.

"Despite the inevitable, if gradual, collapse of the high-card philosophy, current authorities cling to the empty shell of the high-card gauge and installment unit," Mr. Bissell continues, but "wearying of the ever increasing maze of distributional correctives, the average player has an instinctive conviction that a sound system should rest on a few simple and elementary principals and not on endless regulations and perpetual revisions.

First Aim of Partners

The distributional philosophy of bidding has for the first aim of partners the fixing of a mutually acceptable denomination to serve tentatively for the play of the hand and also as a safe starting point for the development of such resources as the partners may have.

"Thus distributional bidding divides into two stages," Mr. Bissell discloses. "They initial bidding aims at the establishment of a base of operations; the following supplementary bidding aims at the development of shifting and climbing resources; that is, resources for a possible shift to some other denomination. The important factor in the initial stage is an opening discrimination between the four elementary types of distribution.

"The distributional system avoids conflict between distribution and high cards by banring localized high-card requirements from the opening bids. While it may be necessary to have varying degrees of high-card strength somewhere in the hand, there are no localizing high-card requirements for the bid suit of a one-suiter, for the two suits of a two-suiter (double lengths), or for the three suits of a three-suiter (triple fours or the equivalent), nor is a four-suiter (quadruple supports), required to have its strength spread through any particular number of suits. The unhampered disclosure of distribution is a far greater protection than the casual placing of a high card trick or two."

The Snob

Asked to write briefly what he knew of the Diet of Worms, a city scholar replied:—

"I know nothing about them at all, as my people would never dream of using them for food."

NIPPON CULTURAL FEDERATION SCHEDULE

At 10 a.m. Tuesday there will be the regular class of flower arrangement. Professor Chikao Fujisawa will speak in German on the Japan-German Anti-Comintern Pact at 5 p.m. Thursday at a meeting for Occidentals. Mr. Mukharji, an Indian art student, will speak on Indian life with the help of lantern slides at the meeting for Orientals at 5 p.m. Friday. All the meetings will be at the Federation forum in the New Osaka Building in Uchisaiwai-cho. All interested are cordially invited to attend.

TO GIVE COCKTAIL PARTY

The Iranian Minister and Mrs Azimi will be hosts at a farewell cocktail party from 6 to 8 p.m Wednesday, December 16, in honor of the Iranian Counsellor and Mrs. Ardeshir, who will leave Japan shortly. All friends are invited

HOME PROBLEM CLUB MEETING

The next meeting of the Home Problem Club will be held at 10 a.m. Wednesday December 9. The program will be a musical one under the direction of Mrs. Paul Gerhard. Attention is called to the fact that the meeting will be at the home of the president, Mrs. T. I. Brumbaugh, 65 Miyashita-cho, Koishikawa-ku and not at the Aoyama Gakuin as usual. Members will receive cards giving directions for finding this address. Anyone in doubt may telephone Mrs. Brumbaugh at Otsuka 1869.

VICE PRESIDENT APPOINTED

The National Board of the National League of American Pen Women appointed Mrs. Edith de Garis Vice-President of the League for the Japanese Empire at its October meeting. The appointment of a vice-president was considered desirable in view of the extension of the activities of the league in the Far East.

EXHIBITION OF OSHIE

An exhibition of oshie (Japanese applique) by Mrs. Tsuruko Morioka will be given at the New Exhibition Hall of the Souvenir Section of the Shirokiya Department Store, Nihonbashi from 9 a.m. to 8 p.m. December 8 to 12, under the auspices of the Nippon Cultural Federation.

The art of oshie was practiced mostly by the ladies of the Daimyo households but has been sadly neglected and became to be an art of the past. Only recently Mrs. Morioka's beautiful creations were discovered by chance by Miss Katherine Ball an American art critic. All who are interested are cordially invited to the exhibition.

ARRIVING ON ASAMA MARU

Among the passengers arriving December 12 on the Asama Maru will be Bishop and Mrs. G. D. Batdorf and Dr. and Mrs. S. C. Enck of Harrisburg, Pennsylvania. They are coming to visit the work of the United Brethren Church in Japan, China and the Philippines. Later they will go via ports to Palestine and Europe, planning to reach America next April or May.

AT HOTEL NEW GRAND

New arrivals at the Hotel New Grand are Mr. W. J. Yetton and Mr. and Mrs. A. C. Chaterji and their daughter.

KANSAI NEWS

Mr. Stabth gave a lecture on Negro's poems and songs at the After Luncheon Club on the fourth floor of the Meikai Building from 12:10 p.m. on December 4.

The meeting will be open to the public and any one interested is cordially invited to attend.

Argentine Trade Presents Problems To Great Britain

beef. Argentina will no longer produce it, for other countries have not the taste, do not need it, or are unwilling to pay the price, says The Times, London.

The meat question has been the biggest difficulty in the present Anglo-Argentine trade negotiations. The British Government first proposed a duty of 1¼d. a lb. on Argentine beef, but this was subsequently reduced to ¾d. a lb. For Argentina this was still too high. Contrary to the economic theory that "the consumer always pays" the Argentine stock breeders maintained that the tax would fall upon the producer. It was hinted, however, in official circles that the tax might be acceptable if accompanied by reciprocal concessions.

In the meat discussions the point upon which Argentina has been most insistent is the management of the quota. With the exception of two small Argentine companies all the meat packers are British or American. Under the treaty the British Government reserved the right to decide from which packing companies its meat imports should come, though a concession of 15 per cent of the total was alloted for disposal to the Argentine Government. Argentina wishes that in the new treaty the entire distribution of the quota shall be in her hands, and it is understood that in principle the United Kingdom is agreeable. This seems mainly a question of Argentine amour propre, since it is unlikely that for many years to come Argentine packers will be able to handle the bulk of the meat destined for Britain. It is therefore probable that the chilling and packing of meat will remain in the same hands as at present.

Privileged Exchange

The meat difficulty is interwoven with other aspects of the general trade relations between the two countries. Under the terms of the last treaty the United Kingdom holds a priveleged position among exporters to Argentina—a position to which she feels entitled as a country which buys from Argentina more than twice what she sells. The official import rate of exchange is 17 pesos to the £, and foreign currency at this rate is allotted to importers from different countries in proportion to their purchases from Argentina. a surcharge of 20 per cent being levied upon imports from countries which sell to Argentina more than they buy from her. It is decided according to the country whether articles of luxury are subject to the surcharge or not. French brandy pays the surcharge, while Scotch whisky is exempt. There are other privileges, too, in connection with the remittance of dividends, the cumulative effect of which is seen in the results of the treaty.

During the recent negotiations there have been assertions both in the United Kingdom and in Argentina that only the other country was favored by the treaty of 1933. Trade between the two countries since 1932, however, would indicate that the agreement was of mutual benefit. According to Argentine statistics, Argentine imports from the United Kingdom rose from 177,000,000 pesos in 1932 to 208,000,000 in 1933, 230,000,000 in 1934, and 237,000,000 pesos in 1935. Exports to the United Kingdom were 465,000,000 pesos in 1932, 411,000,000 in 1933 (during only a part of which year the treaty was operating), 553,000,000 in 1934, and 472,000,000 pesos in 1935.

In the treaty of 1933 there was a clause under which Argentina promised that, so long as exchange was controlled, the full amount of sterling derived from the sale of Argentine products to the United Kingdom should be used for remittances to that country, after deducting a reasonable amount for service of the Argentine public debt in other countries. On May 1 last the Argentine Government issued a detailed statement showing that this promise had been fulfilled, with the exception of a small balance amounting to £1,500,000, which had not transferred because no applications had been made for it within the terms of the agreement. Later in the same month the British Embassy in Buenos Aires announced that it agreed substantially with the statement. This is important because it implies that since the treaty the United Kingdom's visible and invisible exports to Argentina together have been roughly equal to her imports from Argentina.

The British standpoint in the negotiations has been criticized in the Argentine Press on the ground that the United Kingdom claimed the retention of all her existing privileges, while Argentina was asked to grant concessions as regards her meat exports in the form both of a duty and a reduced quota. It was also said that under the bilateral trading system now in vogue Argentina could not see her way to buy more from Britain unless she could increase her exports to the United Kingdom, and that the British attitude was calculated to reduce imports from Argentina instead of increasing them.

On the British side it has been contended that the Argentine Government's depreciation of the peso by 20 per cent in November, 1933, just after signature of the treaty, was contrary to the spirit, if not to the letter, of the treaty, since it was equivalent to an import duty. Also the system of exchange control whereby the Argentine Government paid exporters at 15 pesos to the £ and collected 17 pesos to the £ from importers, thus making a large profit, was regarded as an unfair tax on the importer.

Lastly there is the question of British investments in Argentina, which, under the terms of the agreement of 1933, were entitled to "benevolent treatment." Receipts of the British-owned railways have fallen steadily, and no dividends have been paid on the Ordinary shares for more than six years. This is partly due to trade depression, but also to the delay in dealing with the competition of motor transport by effective Federal legislation. The Federal Transport Coordination Bill, which was framed as long ago as 1932, passed the Chamber of Deputies last year, but has not yet been considered by the Senate. It is, however, on the agenda of the extraordinary sessions at present being held. The Buenos Aires Urban Transport Coordination Bill, which recently became law, scarcely benefits the railways, as its scope is limited to the municipal area of the City of Buenos Aires.

Britain Studies Air Parity And Defense

Secretary of State for Air gave the French first line strength as 1,650 machines. And in the intervening period of nearly three years France has spent immense sums on the expansion of her air force.

As regards the official estimate of Germany's first line strength there is the fact that so far back as November, 1934, Lord Londonderry, who was then Air Minister, placed it at 1,000 machines. In view of Germany's colossal expenditure on armaments during the past two years, her great aircraft industry—considerably expanded in the same period—her air transport system which is by far and away the largest and most highly developed in Europe, her network of aerodromes, and her hundreds of flying clubs, can it seriously be maintained that she has added no more than 200 machines in two years?

On May 22, 1935, Mr. Baldwin declared that: "A totalitarian State can increase its national defenses in absolute secrecy; it can draw a curtain round all that is happening in the country; nothing appears in the Press; no word is said in public, and nothing is said in Parliament." The Prime Minister spoke with feeling, for he had been discountenanced by the sudden revelation of Germany's strength two months earlier, which had shown that he had been badly misled. Is it not possible that he is again being misled? Can estimates which imply that the outcome of the feverish efforts made by France in the last three years is retrogression, and that the still mightier efforts made by Germany in the past two years is an insignificant increase of 200 machines be justified by the Ministerial statements of the past, or by known facts, or, indeed, by any accepted standard of logic or common sense.

Not Heading For Parity

Is this a time for lullabies? The writer ventures to submit, after prolonged study and careful inquiry on both sides of the Channel, that Germany's present firstline strength is at least 2,500 aircraft, and that this figure represents also the approximate strengths in first-line machines of France and of Italy. Our own first-line strength today is 960 machines.

Whether or not the above estimates prove to be accurate, the evidence leaves no room for doubt that the aerial strength of each of these countries greatly excels our own. And in each case their rate of expansion also excels our own, for theirs is proceeding on the nation-wide basis rendered possible by conscription, whereas ours is mainly confined to the development of a voluntary regular Air Force. Consequently we are not heading for parity, avowedly the irreducible minimum for national safety, but for progressive inferiority in the air.

Since we have no intention of resorting to conscription, the only course open to us would appear to be to broaden our basis of development by fully exploiting our Territorial organization. And should our aircraft production be inadequate to keep pace with the outcome of this additional source of increase, we have the means to purchase aircraft from the United States.

Slav Woman, 100, Free After 7 Years In Prison

PANTSCHOWA, Yugoslavia, Nov. 7.—At the age of 100, "Grandma" Anuika has returned to her home near here after having served half of a fifteen-year sentence for selling poisons. She was found guilty in 1928, after a sensational trial, of having provided for peasant women poisons with which they killed their husbands. She pleaded that she had sold them only powders and potions with which to win back their spouses' affections, says the New York Herald Tribune.

Her relatives expected that the woman would not survive her term in prison, but upon her release she pointed out that her parents had lived to be 110.

Britain Facing Critical Jewish-Arab Situation

Jews of Palestine have been unable to meet themselves. This gives some measure of what the strike has cost Jewry, says the Times, London.

With these qualities of resilience on both sides in view, bankers, and others who keep their fingers on the economic pulse of the country, believe that it may recover fairly quickly from the effects of the strike. Two mitigating factors are already beginning to have their effect. One is the exceptionally high prices likely to be realized this year for citrus-fruit, owing to the disturbance of the Spanish market and the excellent quality of the local crop. The other is the money being spent by the army. Two divisions of British soldiers are capable of dispensing quite a lot of cash in a short time, given the opportunity. This expenditure is particularly valuable, because it is widely distributed, and reaches almost every class of the population. There will be scarcely a village in the country which will not have earned a windfall from the sale of eggs or fruit or the hire of camels or donkeys to the troops, while keepers of cafes and refreshment-bars and dealers in curios and photographic materials have been reaping a rich harvest.

No Surrender

On the other hand the hope entertained by some persons that the strike might lead to a "detente" between the two races, by showing them how much each depended on the other, does not seem likely to be realized. Each side seems to think that it has stood the trial successfully and has emerged from it more conscious of its strength than before. The Arabs regard it as a triumph that they have stood united and undefeated for nearly six months, and have only given up the struggle on the advice of their friends. They have realized the value of passive resistance, provided that they hold together. From start to finish they have spoken of their movement as "the strike" rather than "the rebellion," as if emphasizing the passive rather than the active resistance offered to the Government. This was done instinctively, but they realize now that the instinct was correct, for the passive resistance of the shopkeepers in keeping their shops closed, of the omnibus and taxi owners in keeping their vehicles off the roads, and of the villagers in declining to give information about the movements of the bands was far harder for the Government to tackle than the activities of the bands themselves.

So now they believe that an economic boycott will, through being intangible, prove a more effective weapon against the Jews than terrorism. At all points where the Arabs are now dependent on the Jews in the economic sphere they propose to operate themselves. Arab tradespeople are planning to open shops in lines at present controlled by the Jews, and no doubt pressure will be put upon the Arab public to take its custom to these shops. In this the Palestinian Arabs are not depending entirely upon themselves. For example, the two most fashionable cafes in Jerusalem, frequented alike by Jews, Arabs, and Europeans, are in Jewish hands. Now negotiations have been begun with the owner of a group of cafes in Cairo to open one in Jerusalem and another in Jaffa. An Arab grocer was found since the strike to be stocking biscuits made by a Jewish firm in Tel-Aviv. A group of young men visited him and told him that in future he must buy his biscuits from a firm in Damascus. His Jewish biscuits were taken from him to be given to the poor.

This kind of "Watch Committee" work is being undertaken by the Arab "National Guard," a body which was organized at the beginning of the strike and the members of which provided the strike committees in most of the towns and large villages. It does not seem likely that these tactics will take the Arabs far, for they will be fighting the Jews on the Jews' own ground, but they believe that they can make things difficult, and that is enough. They want to prove to them (and to the British) that Palestine can never be the Jewish National Home.

If there has been no surrendering of their standpoint by the Arabs the same can be said of the Jews. They are proud that the economic structure of their community in Palestine, which is naturally more artifical than that of the Arabs, has emerged unscathed and even strengthened from the trial, that Jews have stood shoulder to shoulder and helped one another. The townspeople have bought the products of the Jewish colonies, even when they could barely afford them, in order that the colonies might live. The farmers have bought the products of Jewish factories at a loss to their pockets that the factories might survive. The strike of the Arab port workers at Jaffa was met by the construction of their jetty at Tel Aviv. This is not intended by its Jewish promoters to be a rival to Jaffa, at all events for the present; but they hope to use the threat of its development to obtain the consent of the Jaffa port workers to the employment of a certain percentage of Jews among the Jaffa stevedores and porters. If they do not succeed in consolidating their position in Jaffa in this way, then the port at Tel Aviv is to be developed at all costs.

Jewish Defense

The defense scheme for the Jewish colonies, devised after the 1929 riots with the cooperation of the police, has been tested throughout these past months and has proved reliable. The watch-towers, the bullet-proof buildings, the sealed armouries of rifles and ammunition to be used only in case of an attack on the settlement, have all seen service. Only in a single case did an attack by Arabs succeed in reaching the buildings of a settlement, and then the attackers were repulsed by the settlers themselves. The number of men among the Jewish population with training in the handling of arms has greatly increased. Roughly 3,000 supernumerary Jewish police have been enlisted. This knowledge has given the Jewish community fresh confidence, but in the light of recent experience some improvements are being made.

The network of communications between the Jewish areas is likewise being improved by a vast series of new roads, which are being built by the Government with the double purpose of increasing security and relieving unemployment. The coastal road from Tel Aviv to Haifa, which will link up a whole string of Jewish colonies, is now being pushed forward at great speed. The decisive stretch of 14 miles from Tel Mond to Hedera, including the bridging of the Iskanderuna River, is to be completed before the rains; this will shorten the journey from Haifa and the Jewish colonies in the northern coastal plain to Tel Aviv, and, what is perhaps more important, will save Jewish travellers from passing through Arab districts where they might be molested. A transverse road from Tulkarm to Nathania on the coast, where a new military camp is being erected, is already almost complete. Two other important sections of new road, from Affuleh to Shatta Station and from Nahalal to Ginegar, will provide better and less hazardous communications between the Jewish settlements in Jezreel. Altogether some 36 miles of new Government road will have been provided this year in Jewish districts, and to these about 50 miles of feeder-roads will be added, the expense of which will be shared between the Government and the Jewish communities.

Thus the Jews of Palestine feel that if they have to face another Arab rising they will be on a better footing than before. Meanwhile they have not altered in the slightest degree their aim of developing and extending their holdings in Palestine, so that they may be able to support as many as possible of their race as soon as possible. Between this "Yea" of the Jews and the "Nay" of the Arabs there is no visible compromise. This is the problem which the Royal Commission has to face. It will be its task to try to alter the picture as each side sees it until the two views coincide, and for the British Government to impose the alterations if it can.

Czechoslovakia Continues Fight Against Bolshevism

is directed against Germany. On the contrary, innumerable proofs of Czechoslovakia's policy of peace go to show that Czechoslovakia has never had, nor has now, any aggressive intentions whatsoever against Germany, and that she has no interest in Germany being convulsed in the horrors of civil war. The mutual economic contacts between Czechoslovakia and Germany are so extensive that internal convulsions of any kind in Germany that would inevitably affect her economic capacity would result at once in a considerable weakening of the economic position of Czechoslovakia. The Republic would feel this all the more severely, for the reason that as an exporting country she is most seriously affected by the world economic crisis, and that any further crisis in her neighborhood might even threaten the very bases of her economic strength.

Czechoslovakia as a State that is quantitatively considerably inferior to Germany is compelled to reckon with this differences in strength. It is moreover obvious to everyone that no State is so foolish, much less Czechoslovakia, to lend its territory for the purpose of foreign aggressive plans against Germany. Her geographical, economical and political situation compels Czechoslovakia—whatever might be her orientation or under whatever regime she might be—in her own interests to have nothing to do with aggressive designs. Objective conditions, on the contrary, compel her to pursue a consistently peaceful and purely defensive policy.

For these reasons Czechoslovakia, ever since her restoration to independence, has exerted all her efforts to prevent the rise of any political and military blocs that would bring the menace of war nearer. For these reasons she has been a faithful servant to the League of Nations, to which she pinned, and still pins, her hopes that the League will prevent any such division of Europe into hostile camps. For these reasons she has worked with all the means at her disposal to ensure peace, whether in the form of treaties of arbitration which she has concluded with all her neighbors with the exception of Hungary who did not desire such a treaty, or in some other form. For these reasons Czechoslovakia desired to make the apparatus of the League of Nations as effective as possible in the cause of peace, and this she did by endeavoring to give concrete character to the general principles of the Pact by a system of regional agreements concluded within the framework, and in the spirit and under the control of the League. In these regional agreements, the aim of which was always and exclusively the ensurance of peace against possible aggression, Czechoslovakia sees even for the future the most certain means for the proper functioning of the Pact of the League of Nations. On the other hand Czechoslovakia has also striven to see that regional agreements for defense or mutual aid pacts should not be agreements that excluded the participation of any other State.

Little Entente's Policy

On this basis and on these principles is built up not only Czechoslovakia's Little Entente policy, but also her treaty of mutual aid with Soviet Russia, in which, moreover, Czechoslovakia sees merely one link in a chain of treaties that would give the like advantages to all other States that are ready to serve the cause of a peace and security in all these directions has been absolutely clear and consistent, although the objective conditions in which Czechoslovakia exists in the heart of Europe convincingly prove that the Republic in its own interest cannot countenance an aggressive policy, nevertheless her treaty of mutual aid with the Soviet Union has for months past been the subject of the most varied tendentious and fanciful assertions designed to show—in face of the facts that can be ascertained by every unbiased person—that by this treaty Czechoslovakia is pursuing quite other aims than those of her own defense.

An attempt has even been made by fictions of the most varied character to suggest that Czechoslovak-Soviet collaboration far exceeds the limits of the public agreement on the point. Among the fictions of this type are the reports about military aerodromes which are said to have been, and are being, constructed in Slovakia for the Soviet air fleet. Other reports of this character speak of large numbers of Soviet officers in the Czechoslovak army, of the erection of big strategic objects with the assistance of Soviet officers and in the interests of the Soviet military power, and so on. These reports are without exceptions mere fictions, the inaccuracy of which may easily be proved by anyone who inquires into the matter on the spot. Those who spread these reports, however, are not concerned to ascertain facts, and therefore they are often heedless of the circumstance that their stories are wholly improbable and ridiculous. They are concerned only to arouse the suspicion that the reports, however exaggerated, could not be spread unless there was a grain of truth in them somewhere.

For this reason do these who spread these reports go to such lengths, such as quite recently when the Correspondent of the Berliner Tageblatt, Dennis, ventured on 30th August last to assert that the Prague hotels were so crowded with Soviet officers that it was scarcely possible to get accommodation there. This assertion was made in face of the fact that hundreds of foreigners from practically every country, staying in the different hotels at Prague at that time, could see at the most three Russian officers, who were staying in Prague perfectly openly with no attempt at concealment, the object of their visit being to be present—in sight of the military representatives of the foreign powers and to the same extent as they—at the Czechoslovak Army maneuvers.

Falsehood Printed

For this reason are certain definite items of news falsified without the slightest scruple, as is illustrated, for example, by the report appearing in the Berlin Borsenzeitung of the 22nd August last, where it was stated that the Soviet paper "Na Striashe" had published a map of the Czechoslovak aerodromes with the title "Our Aerodromes in Czechoslovakia." The truth is that the paper in question published on the 9th of February last a map with the title "New Aerodromes in Czechoslovakia."

In addition to these fictions and distorted reports there are of course others spread abroad that bear witness to the gross ignorance of their authors. For example the German Press spread abroad the report (see, for example, the Neue Preusische Kreuzzeitung of the 24th June 1936) that schools had been set up in Czechoslovakia for the training of Communist agitators, and that there was to be observed at Prague a growth of seditious Communist propaganda, the city being the headquarters of the Trocky group. The author, it is obvious, did not know, what is now clear to everyone since the recent Moscow trial, that he was accusing Czechoslovakia of something that she ought not to permit on her soil precisely out of loyalty to the Soviet Union. Similarly ignorant and false is the whole propaganda, which can of course only be successful with those who have not even the most elementary knowledge of Czechoslovakia, of Central Europe and of European politics.

It is naturally a serious matter if such assertions are repeated by a responsible member of the German Government. This occurred, for example, on the 10th of September at the Nuremburg Congress of the National-Socialist Party when Dr. Goebbels reiterated the assertions about the existence of Soviet aerodromes in Czechoslovakia, although these assertions had been more than once expressly and emphatically denied by the Czechoslovak authorities and by the President of the Republic, Dr. Benes himself. In these circumstances the unbiased observer will no longer doubt the inaccuracy of the assertions made by German propaganda. He will only ask why these assertions are spread abroad.

Valparaiso Holds 400th Birthday

Street Pageants And Exhibitions Add To Carnival Spirit Of The Occasion

A carnival spirit reigns in Valparaiso, Chile. With elaborate celebrations—five months of them—the city is commemorating the four hundredth anniversary of its founding.

"'Valpo,' as the city is called by many of its residents, is a double-decker like Bahia, Brazil, on the other side of the South American Continent," says the National Geographic Society.

Lower Town for Business

"The lower town occupies a level strip of land encompassing the harbor. Beyond it is a high steep cliff, its face flecked here and there with small indentations occupied by tiny huts of humble residents. Atop the cliff is the principal residental section where Valparaiso is at home in clusters of small homes as well as huge mansions. One moves from one level to another by means of 'ascensors' (steeply inclined elevators). At only one place in the cliff can trams climb to the upper town.

"It was along the narrow, bayside, little-above-sea-level shelf that Valparaiso was born. That portion of the city now is almost entirely given over to business. The main business street, flanked with modern bank and business buildings, is at the foot of the cliff. Between that street and the bay is another parallel street. The contrast between the two thoroughfares is striking. The main street is congested with modern traffic, buses and trams; the other with traffic that was modern in the city centuries ago.

Rural Chile in Street Pageant

"Trains of donkeys, with their slim bodies hung about with almost every conceivable article, come and go. Some are loaded with wine casks, others with sacks of flour or cement, and still others with long pieces of iron, and with furniture. Boards 16 to 20 feet long are slung over the sides of the animals, sticking out many feet fore and aft. The Chileans have a way of making almost anything accommodate itself to packsaddle transportation.

"Private motor cars are conspicuously absent in the lower town because distances are not great. Sharing the streets with the packsaddle donkeys are strings of carts, drawn in the fashion of the country—one horse hitched between the shafts, and at its left a second, attached to the cart by means of a breast collar and a single rope trace. This second horse carries a saddle and on it the driver of the cart.

"Vina del Mar, Valparaiso's swank suburb, plays a dual role; it is also the Atlantic City of Chile. It is like a vast flower garden five miles long, climbing from the seashore to the heights. Villas bowered in roses, wistaria, poppies, pansies, and blossoming trees, set amid rich shrubs, are everywhere. At the height of the social season Vina del Mar displays quiet dignified smartness. Horse racing is a passion with the Chileans and the summer racing season at Vina del Mar brings to its tracks the best stables of the whole country.

"The upper town of Valparaiso offers an excellent grandstand from which to watch the parade of shipping in and out of the deep harbor. Old Glory mingles generously with the emblems of Great Britain, Norway, Germany, France, Italy, Holland, and Japan on masts that are supported by ships of many sizes and shapes. At times the city's harbor accommodate a mixture of humanity nearly as strange as that at Singapore's waterfront.

"Valparaiso was torn by earthquake and fire the same year those forces of destruction set upon San Francisco. Most of the damage at 'Valpo,' however, was in the lower town. Some of the debris was piled in the streets and a new pavement laid on top of it. As a result, to reach some of the buildings, one must walk down several steps from the street level."

Compton Urges Industry To Use More Research

back into the business for development and research that plants and methods have become obsolete.

Support Comes Harder

"Economic strength has been so depleted that it is difficult to secure the financial support necessary to inaugurate a really effective and promising research program.

"One thing is certain: The longer an effective scientific approach is delayed, the more serious to overcome such difficulties in the industries of this category, two movements deserve mention: first are the efforts by the industrial associations to cooperate in establishing scientific studies and research activities for their joint benefit; second are the efforts by governments to assist these industries.

"Notably Great Britain, Germany and the Union of Socialist Soviet Russia have established research programs. In this country there has been notable assistance in industry through the patent office, the national bureau of standards and tariff protection but there has been a most regrettable and short-sighted lack of balance in the policy of government expenditure for the general stimulation of industry.

Short-Sighted Policy

"Huge expenditures for construction and production only, with no provision for research and development aimed at better construction and new production in the future, are woefully short-sighted. Whatever may be the agency, whether government of industrial association or individual unit in the industry, it is certain that research to a substantial amount in the fields of physics will be called upon in the building, textile, railroad and other great industries of similar type. Obstacles exist in the lack of vision among key directors on the one hand and on the other the blind faith of those who expect science to work miracles overnight."

Dr. Compton concluded his address as retiring chairman of the institute by reaffirming a previous assertion that the influence of scientific research has far exceeded that of wars, political alignments or social theories. "Great accomplishments of physics are the logical outgrowth of well-planned programs of research and sustained effort on an adequate scale is the prerequisite to achievement," he said.

The Meijiza Theater Gives Shimpa Plays

A joint performance of the Shimpa with the Masao Inouye Troupe and with Miss Yayeko Mizutani is being held at the Meijiza Theater this month. The program consists of "The youth of My Papa," Minoru Nakano, "The Master of the Third Class Post Office" by Matsutaro Kawaguchi and "The Tale of the New Moon" by Masao Kume. These three plays are tragedies, but there is also a certain amount at wit and humor.

The principal roles of the "The youth of My Papa" are being performed by the Misses Yayeko Mizutani, Fusako Fujima, Yoshiko Okada, Shizuko Kawase and Messrs. Masao Inouye, Masao Murata, Michio Katsukawa, Tomosaburo Ii and Ichiro Shimizu. In the "Master of the Third Class Post Office" the Misses Fusako Fujima, Yayeko Mizutani, Hisako Akashi and Messrs, Tomosaburo Ii, Masao Inouye, Seizo Namura, Naruo Narushima, Masao Murata, and Satoshi Yamamura have the leading parts.

"The Tale of the New Moon" is performed by the Misses Hakuko Mori, Yayeko Mizutani, Takeko Murata, Mineko Murata, Yoshiko Okada and Messrs. Toshio Yamaguchi, Wakaba Tomonari, Tomosaburo Ii, Minosuke Yamada, Naruo Narushima, and several others.

All the plays are written by leading playwrights who recently gained much public favor in literary magazines. "The Youth of My Papa" is a story of the love between Mr. Shuntaro Nagashima, M.P., and a young singer of Kouta music. The "Master of the Third Class Post Office" is a story about prodigal son of the master of a third class post office. The son is finally killed by the father because he attempted to steal a parcel post package when the father was delivering mail one night.

The last play "The Tale of the New Moon" is a love story and tells of the love between a music instructor at a girls' high school and his student.

Denies King Plans To Wed American

British Magazine Finds Scant Chance He Will Abdicate Or Marry Mrs. Simpson

N. Y. Times

LONDON, Nov. 12—The Week, a privately circulated and mimeographed magazine, concludes there is little possibility that King Edward will either abdicate or marry Mrs Wallis Simpson, a copy of the magazine revealed today.

Under the heading "The King and the Rumors," the magazine, dealing at length with high rates for insurance that Edward's coronation will take place next Spring as scheduled, asserts:

"The difficulty of finding a valid reason for having an insurable interest in the King's marriage hasn't prevented a brisk business from being done in insurance against this possibility.

"Even more symptomatic of the frank gambling which is based on hints and rumors of the King's private affairs are the rates quoted for postponement of the coronation.

Great Uncle's Age Factor

"Actually the most important factor in any calculation of the possibility of postponement is to the Duke of Connaught (the King's great uncle). It is thought the Duke is at present in good health, but he is now a very old man, and were he to die suddenly on the eve of the coronation, the ceremony might well be postponed.

"This factor might account for a slightly higher rate than usual, but certainly does not explain the present rate nor the special rate of 8 per cent, which on this occasion, for the first time, is being quoted against postponement for causes other than the death of a member of the royal family, the King's illness, or war.

"There are, therefore, excluded all but one of other than the most remote reasons for the postponement, and that one remaining possibility is abdication.

"The idea behind the rate is that the King will insist on marrying Mrs. Simpson and that the opposition of the bishops to such nonconformity and of the Conservative party generally will force him from the throne.

"The rate, of course, does not mean there is a 12-to-1 chance of the King's abdication before the next year or even, in that contingency, that the brokers think these are the odds, but only that there are rather more suckers about than was generally supposed.

"In any case, there is yet no evidence at all to support the premise of the American press and the City gamblers that there is an affection between the King and Mrs. Simpson of the kind they suppose, or that either party has yet contemplated marriage with the other."

Under the subheading, "Palace Battle," The Week declares that a "battle royal" is under way in court circles between the "old guard," which resents the King's friendship with Mrs. Simpson, and the "newer type of courtier," who apparently thinks Mrs. Simpson is "ace high."

"Almost since the King's accession, there have been two parties around the palace," it continues. "One, representing the newer type of courtier of which Sir John Aird is typical, is on the inside; the other, the old guard, over whom towers the substantial figure of Lord Derby, is on the outside furiously counter-attacking.

"The old guard disapprove most strongly of the new court, and, although Derby himself is far too astute a politician to stoop to such methods, there is no doubt a certain old palace set, without his approval, has definitely set afloat various rumors in connection with the King and Mrs. Simpson, hoping thus to bring to their side the most valuable factors in any such attack, the two Archbishops [of the Church of England].

"Along this line, the old guard has had certain success, and some ten days ago the Archbishops had in fact an audience with the King, in which, the old guard freely rumored, Mrs. Simpson was discussed.

"However, these attempts to discredit the King's friendship for Mrs. Simpson were dispelled when she lunched last week with the Queen.

One Success for Old Guard

"The old guard can only report one local success. At Aberdeen a well-fostered rumor about the King's failure, when at Balmoral, to attend some local function due in some inexplicable way to Mrs. Simpson's influence, resulted in the chalking of streets in one district at least with personal attacks on the King.

Adds Weight And Likes It

Dieting to preserve slender figures may be all right for the majority of Hollywood actresses, but Grace Hale is the exception. She eats to her heart's content, because it brings her happiness—and adds to her bank account.

When blonde Grace Hale came to motion pictures from the New York stage five years ago, she weighed 115 pounds and, through a course in rigid dieting, had a figure that was the envy of the entire film colony.

Casting directors, though, were strangely indifferent to her pleas for work. She pleaded, begged and cajoled, but jobs were few and far between.

Finally Miss Hale, currently working in Columbia's "Theodora Goes Wild," starring Irene Dunne and Melvyn Douglas, gave up in disgust. She would desert the movies if need be, but first she was going to have food she enjoyed so much. She turned to her beloved mashed potatoes with plenty of gravy. She ate the richest of desserts. A snack in mid-afternoon and midnight became a part of her regular schedule.

With twenty pounds added, Miss Hale started to interest casting directors. For the past four years she has been in constant demand as a comedienne. Her worries are gone and her bank account has increased.

"I don't want to be thin," says Miss Hale, as she munches on a box of chocolates. "I'd rather eat and work."

Bushido Hogaraka

Kingoro, the famous comic story teller in the Tokyo vaudevilles, is starred in the PCL comedy "Bushido Hogaraka" which opens at the Nippon Gekijo on December 11. The story concerns the adventures of a heroic samurai Jutaro, whose part is played by Kingoro. The cast includes also Mitsuko Takao, Musei Tokugawa and Teruko Miyano. Minoru Matsui directed the film.

Missouri Fumbles Often But Beats St. Louis, 13-7

ST. LOUIS, Nov. 7.—Almost defeated by their inability to hold the ball, Missouri's Tigers tightened and launched running attacks climaxed by scoring passes for a 13-to-7 victory over St. Louis University's Billikens today.

The Tigers bobbled seven times, one of their fumbles leading to St. Louis' touchdown. The Billikens contributed three misplays.

It was not until the sixth Missouri fumble that St. Louis was able to take advantage of the breaks. When Jack Duncan dropped the ball as he sped off-tackle, the Billikens recovered and marched to their only score late in the second period.

Soviet To Make Navy World's First in Defense

Unbalanced Fleet Will Rely Mainly On Submarines And Fast Torpedo Craft

MOSCOW, Nov. 7—The Soviet Union has launched a naval shipbuilding program designed to convert present blueprints into the greatest defensive navy in the world. It likely also will be the strangest navy in the world, being a completely unbalanced fleet in the view of orthodox naval experts.

The backbone and bulk of the navy will be submarines, together with light, fast torpedo boats and swift destroyers. The Bolshevists already are at work on a few battleships and cruisers, but no great reliance is to be placed upon these, says the N. Y. Herald Tribune.

The number, design and tonnage of Soviet submarines is the great question mark in world admiralties today. This information is one of the Kremlin's closest-guarded secrets, although the commissars last January did announce that submarine tonnage had been increased 435 per cent.

Now, however, the Soviets are utilizing their industrial progress to turn to other forms of ship construction to bulwark the submarine fleets presently based at Kronstadt and Vladivostok, guarding Leningrad and Siberia.

The Soviets now openly boast the Pacific has been rendered impregnable to enemy attack. A completely separate, independent submarine fleet has been built up there which the Bolshevists avow can repel any attack.

In the establishment of this Pacific armada, the Russians have profited from the lesson Japan taught the Czar in 1904, and which drove the Russians from the high seas for nearly a third of a century. With two coastlines far removed from each other, Russia has a problem similar to that of the United States in sea defense. But it has no handy Panama Canal to use in rushing a fleet from one coastline to another.

So in 1904, when Japan went to war with the Czar, the Japanese blew Russia's Pacific fleet out of the water at Port Arthur and then deliberately prepared for Russia's Baltic fleet, sent thousands of miles around Africa and through Suez to join the conflict.

When the lumbering, travel-strained ships came steaming by the Straits of Tsushima, weeks later, the Japanese sunk them almost without trace, destroying a great navy in a single afternoon.

There will be no repetition of that disaster, however, in the Bolshevist plans. The strength of the Pacific fleet is similar on sea to the strength of the land defenses of the Far East. Russia has created a completely independent Far Eastern army, equipped and provisioned to fight without support from the remainder of the Red army.

Re-establishment of the Russian navy has come only with prodigious cost and effort, for the Soviets started with scarcely a rowboat inherited from the Czar. The few old, timeworn ships that survived the World War were scuttled or sunk during the Revolution.

'29 Sea Safety Rules Put Into Effect By U.S.

goods which, by reason of their nature, quantity or mode of stowing, are liable to endanger the lives of passengers or the safety of the ship.

Information to Personnel

Another important provision states that every new passenger ship shall be inclined upon its completion to determine the elements of its stability. The operating personnel shall be supplied with such information on this subject as is necessary to permit efficient handling of the ship.

The convention, in addition to the above, provides for many technical rules and regulations, all designed to promote the safety of life and property at sea. The principle of ready availability of life-saving appliances was uppermost in the minds of the delegates, who had in mind not only the Vestris disaster, but the torpedo tragedies of wartime.

The eighteen signatories to the convention are the governments of Germany, the Commonwealth of Australia, Belgium, Canada, Denmark, Spain, the Irish Free State, the United States of America, Finland, France, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, India, Italy, Japan, Norway, The Netherlands, Sweden and the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics.

League Still Gives Democracies Hope

Mussolini's View That It Is Dead Is Not Shared By Others In Europe

By CLARENCE K. STREIT

GENEVA, Nov. 6.—Is the League of Nations practically dead as Premier Mussolini of Italy once more shouts? Or may the League once more tackle an aggressor "with diabolical method and diligence," which Mussolini in the next breath, but for the first time, concedes Geneva showed against him?

The answer depends upon what is meant by the League. If it is meant that the Wilsonian mechanism for enforcing peace is finished, the answer here is no; on the contrary, Mussolini's speech, by bringing European war near, improves the chances of the League's playing a bigger role and tackling an aggressor with more speed, method and diligence.

The view that the League is finished as an important factor in world politics seems to be based mainly on the failure of its mechanism not merely to prevent the Manchurian and Ethiopian wars but to prevent the triumph of the aggressors. But the League enforcement machinery will have another test if a war starts in Europe, it was reported to the New York Times.

The Real Test

That tragic test, paradoxically, will be held under conditions much more favorable to the League machinery than previous ones. The Manchurian and Ethiopian tests began with the aggressor seated at the Council table and able to obstruct and delay every League move. They began in regions far removed from Europe, wherein lie the vital interests of the main League members.

The test for which European diplomatic offices are preparing is one that will be inside Europe, with the aggressor likely to be outside the Council. It is true that Mussolini, despite all he said at Milan, carefully avoided drawing the logical conclusion—withdrawal from Geneva. If one is preparing against a European war coming soon, however, one can for all practical diplomatic purposes count Italy as a non-League member.

With every allowance made, the fact remains that if a European war starts, the League will have far more incentive to act than before, and will have much less sand on its track, and so it may then astonish the world by its speed.

A European war, moreover, means a war between coalitions. What aim is going to hold each together and how are they going to coordinate war?

Democracies Need Ideal

For the democracies to fight before being invaded, a war must appear to them to be for some ideal. In 1914 they needed an ideal that Czarist Russia could share, so as to give them its support. They found it in "the rights of small nations," which applied equally to Serbia and Belgium. Britain and France face the same problem as regards Communist Russia now, and maintenance of the League covenant gives them now their only common aim. Under what other war aim could they, if attacked, hope to line up with them the greater number of States?

The League provides them with a mechanism for coordinating the action of great and small nations—which, crude as it is, remains the best mechanism yet devised and much superior to that which the Allies improvised from 1914 to 1918.

Such considerations as these seem likely to keep most European governments from agreeing with Mussolini that the League is dead and thus helping him to realize his wishful dictum.

Chinese Custom Of Binding Feet Gradually Dying

The seven-century-old custom of foot-binding in China is now dying a natural death. The "lily feet" which were once the pride of many an aristocratic and fashionable maiden up to 30 years ago are now objects of ridicule and taxation.

With the establishment of the National Government in 1912 and the subsequent introduction of western ideas into China, Chinese women went through an overnight metamorphosis from timid, feet-bound, and "kept-in-the-background" women to self-confident, forward, and independent women that we see nowadays, says the Shanghai Eve. Post & Mercury.

Two decades ago China's womanhood was just awakened from a torpor with bound feet and all, but now Chinese women vibrate with activity. The once "three-inch golden lilies" can now march in ten-league boots like any mere male.

Foot-binding was banned by the new laws of the Republic of China 15 years ago, and women who were thought scandalous with feet unbound before the birth of the new republic suddenly discarded the deeprooted custom to march triumphantly on the road to emancipation.

The process of foot-binding is very cruel and torturing to girls. When girls reach the tender age of five or six it used to be the usual custom to bind their feet tightly with bandages soaked with some kind of ointment or balms. Small girls shrieked with pain every time the feet were bound with new bandages. These daily bindings were carried on for two or three years until the instep of the feet was broken down by pressure and all the toes except the big one were mutilated so that the toes were firmly clasped to the bottom of the feet.

The legend of the origin of foot-binding is as diverse as the leaves of Vallombrosa. One story has it that the custom originated from the men's desire to keep the women from running away. Another version (which is more logical) is that once there was a very handsome, rich, and young emperor in ancient times who had a favorite concubine in his harem, and the emperor's mistress, so the story runs, had exactly three-inch feet. At the premature death of the favored concubine, the emperor was so heart-broken that he never set his eyes on any other woman thereafter. The populace, alarmed over the emperor's unusual bereavement, at once began to search the whole country for a woman with three-inch feet, but to their consternation no one over 15 years of age with three-inch feet could be found. The women then began to bind their feet by mutilating, and breaking the instep to keep the feet within a three-inch measurement.

With the banning of footbinding 15 years ago, the custom was generally on the wane, but in order to stamp it out completely a tax is now levied in various places against bound feet on baby girls. The money realized from the taxes is used for the maintenance of many schools for young girls throughout China.

As far back as 64 A.D. the famed sage Confucius in his Four Books tabooed any practice that would disfigure, mutilate, or destroy the human physical body. If Confucius were to return now he would probably order "Women, unbind thy feet!"

Bryan And Darrow Fight Out Monkey Trial

scientists were put in here for the purpose of discrediting the Bible. I am simply trying to protect the Word of God against the greatest atheist in the United States."

After that outburst, Bryan wilted. His fire was gone. Succeeding answers to Darrow's questions were given in a resigned manner, and some were inaudible a few feet away. The crowd sensed it, and lapsed into fearful silence. Like the mills of the gods, Darrow continued to grind.

"Mr. Bryan, do you believe Eve was the first woman?"

"Yes," was the faint response.

"Do you believe that she was literally made out of Adam's rib?"

"I do," in still lower tones.

"Did you ever discover where Cain got his wife?"

"No. I'll leave you agnostics to hunt for her."

"Do you believe the story of the temptation of Eve by the serpent?"

"I do, sir."

"And you believe, as the Bible says, that because of Eve's sin all womankind was doomed thenceforth to endure the pains of childbirth?"

"That is what it says, and that is what I believe."

"And you believe," continued the implacable Darrow, "that God punished the serpent by condemning snakes forever after to crawl upon their bellies?"

"Yes, I believe that," Bryan mumbled.

"Well, just how do you suppose snakes got around prior to that time?" rasped Darrow.

It was the last straw. Drooping with exhaustion, unable to control his trembling hands and quivering voice, Bryan got slowly to his feet.

Case Ends

"Your Honor," he said, "I think I can shorten this examination. I will answer all Mr. Darrow's questions at once."

In a final effort he turned his face to the audience, and brandishing clenched fists high above his head he cried:

"I want the world to know that this man who does not believe in God is using a Tennessee court to cast slurs on Him. I am not afraid—"

Darrow broke in.

"I object to that statement. I am simply examining you on ideas that no intelligent Christian in the world believes."

"Court is adjourned till nine o'clock tomorrow morning," Judge Raulston. Bryan, his palm leaf fimp at his side, looked down wistfully upon the audience. Two or three pastors came forward to shake his hand, but the great crowd eyed him uncertainly, and slipped away. He looked very tired, and very old. Four days later he was dead.

The remainder is anticlimax. The defense having accomplished its objects, and the prosecution being heartily sick of the whole affair, both were ready to quit. There remained the little item of a verdict. Both sides, but especially the defense, desired a verdict of guilty, in order to have the constitutionality of the statute tested in the Supreme Court. The jury returned the verdict, and Judge Raulston passed sentence. In doing so he made one last blunder. When the case reached the Tennessee Supreme Court it was reversed, not because of any element of constitutionality, but because Judge Raulston had fined Scopes $100, whereas the maximum allowed by law was $50.

They buried the Commoner in Arlington National Cemetery. On that last day a dismal rain fell from clouds so low and black that the street lamps of Washington were turned on in mid-afternoon, as the last note of taps was swallowed by the fog above the Potomac.

Features Of Kabuki Revue Are 27 Explained

(Japanese Music by Jiro Hiraoka)
(Stage Design by Tsurukichi Arashima)

One beautiful spring evening under the mist-covered moon, Watanabe Wataru drinks sake from the cup filled by his wife, Kesa. Later Kesa plays on the Koto at the wish of her husband, but finishing the piece, she begins to cry. Wataru is unable to understand the reason for this, but goes to his wife's room as she wishes.

Scene VII. Watanabe Teinai Shinsho (Kabuki)
(Japanese Music by Jiro Hiraoka and Engyoku Toyozawa)
(Stage Design by Tsurukichi Arashima)

As the night advances, Kesa-Gozen goes to sleep after placing her husband's clothes and hat by her pillow. Yendo Morito appears and opening the door of the room, nods.

Scene VIII. Jiganji Ishidan (Kabuki)
(Japanese Music by Engyoku Toyozawa)
(Stage Design by Tsurukichi Arashima)

Morito, who believed that he killed his rival in love, comes to the stone steps of the Jiganji Temple, but when he looks at the head he carried by the moonlight, he is shocked and falls heavily on the steps.

So far, the Kabuki atmosphere is fully presented, but I am unable to fulfil the wish of most foreigners to have Morito commit "harakiri" at this scene.

Scene IX. Gion no Yakai Kabuki Revue)
(Music by Goro Sudo)
(Stage Design by Nobuyuki Yokogawa)

This scene has no relation whatever with the story of the play. Kago carriers dance: Kamuro coming out of the Kago and dances. There is fighting and then is heard the whistle of an amma (blind masseur), Shinnai songs by Toioi, songs of the peddler of fortune-telling papers, and Kiyari-ondo. A decorated car drawn by men and women dressed in Tekomai fashion appears. Yendo Morito, carrying the head wrapped up in a bundle, passes through the crowd, hiding his face with his straw hat. Gion-bayashi and Baka-odori.

Scene X. Noji
(Western Music by Goro Sudo)
(Stage Design by Nobuyuki Yokogawa)

The scene attempts to present the sad mind of Morito who has decided to become a Buddhist priest, casting aside all the worldly things, to show repentance for his crime.

Scene XI. Nachi-no-taki (Kabuki)
(Western Music by Goro Sudo)
(Stage Design by Ryo Tanaka)

Yendo Morito has become a Buddhist priest and taken the name of Mongaku. He is seen sitting on the rock and meditating. As he suffers, he falls into the water-fall pool. Thunder is heard and the rock breaks in two.

Scene XII. Daigodo (Finale)
(Music by Goro Sudo)
(Stage Design by Ryo Tanaka)

Above the Nachi waterfalls appears Fudomyo-o, accompanied by Kongaradoji and Seitakadoji. The days of Mongaku's vow are completed, and he gains salvation by the blessing of Buddha.

Soviet Press Hits Detention Of Five Ships By Rebels

Not One Of Them Carried Arms To Spain, Claims Moscow Journal

Domei

MOSCOW, Dec. 14—Considerable prominence is given by local newspapers to the reports concerning the detention of five Soviet steamers by Spanish Fascist Warships during the past two weeks. The recent raids by Spanish rebels on Soviet ships since the outbreak of the civil war totals 17, it is reported.

The steamer Stepan Khalturin which early this month unloaded timber at Casablanca was stopped and searched by an insurgent warship on December 4 near Gibraltar, it is announced. The ship carried no cargo, but the rebels even opened the ballast tanks in search of arms contraband.

Two days later, the coal ship Dvinoless heading for Naples from Bremen was stopped by the Fascist warship Alacazar and escorted to Ceuta where it was searched. The freighter Tiflis proceeding from Houston, Texas to Novorossyisk with a cargo of livestock was stopped by a patrol boat and mine sweeper and ordered to proceed to Ceuta. This was on December 12, the coaler Kuzbass was detained by a Fascist mine sweeper while travelling from Bremen to Italy with a full load of coal.

The Soviet oil tanker Avanesov en route to Batum from Hamburg with a cargo of oil products for Germany was stopped by rebel warships and after a short questioning was allowed to go on its way.

Although 17 Soviet vessels alleged to be carrying arms to Spain have been detained and searched by Fascist warships, not one of them have been found to be engaging in the arms trade, the Pravda writes.

Japan-German Anti-Red Committee To Be Formed

Domei

BERLIN, Dec. 12—The committee projected in the Japanese-German Anti-Comintern accord, signed last November 25, "for contemplating and discussing adequate measures for combatting disintegration work of the Communist Internationale" will be formed here in January, it is reliably learned today.

Japanese members of the committee will include the Japanese Ambassador here, Viscount Kintomo Mushakoji; General Hiroshi Oshima, military attache; Mr. Kojiro Inouye, Embassy counsellor, and Mr. Kobayashi, representing the Ministry of Home Affairs who is a specialist in anti-Communist activities. German members of the body will include officials of the Ministries of Foreign Affairs, Propaganda and Interior.

Madrid Defense Council Claims Rebels Repulsed

Domei

MADRID, Dec. 12—The Ministry of Defense announced at noon today that despite a heavy assault by insurgent troops on loyalist defense lines in University City, government troops easily repulsed the attackers. All is quiet along the other war sectors of the republic with the leftists still holding firm in all quarters, the ministry concluded.

The World's Revolving Stage

but unreal female voice of the all-male theaters, and put beautiful women in the women's roles. One of them was his own wife. The realism he adopted instead of the old forms was so vivid that even from my usual seat in the front row, the wooden swords seemed razor-edged blades.

Mr. Kobayashi has in a decade become a potent influence on the Japanese theater. His idea has succeeded because its basis is sound. "The object of the theater," he says, as others have said in the Occident, "is to entertain." But his entertainments are artistic and the Japanese subjects especially are marked by freedom from tradition when tradition entails tiresomeness. For what object is served by the traditional manner if it is not entertaining?

Why All Girls?

Foreigners sometimes view the Takarazuka productions with disapproval. Why all girls? they ask. Girls in male roles is only permissible, from their point of view, when the audience is not expected to receive any illusion as to their sex. From the Japanese point of view this is not true. In the theaters where all the female roles are played by men, the audience never forgets that the "onna-kata" are not women.

The all-girl company is more flexible easier to train and discipline, than an all-boy theater would be, especially in Japan. It is pleasing to the eye, is graceful and highly susceptible to truly artistic development.

As will be seen, December 27th at the Tokyo Takarazuka Theater, some of the girls are capable of creating the artistic illusion required to move the audience, even in the heavy male roles, although they are incapable of making us forget that they are females. Perhaps the novelty and the real artistic value of the girls' performances will rapidly develop a new theater cult in the Occident. Certainly, Occidental audiences will be entertained.

Historical Precedents

Should Mr. Kobayashi seek justification in historical precedent, he need only cite the Globe theater of Shakespeare where the Bard's plays were produced with all-male casts. Or better, in the Japanese theater, which began with exclusively female players. Either because they proved too great an attraction and were acquiring too much influence over the public, or on account of male jealousy, we do not know; but they were eventually disbanded by law.

Women were prohibited to appear on the stage in Japan as they were in Europe. There were male "geisha" as well as male "actresses" with the abuses that might have been expected. New edicts required the "actresses" to shave part of the head. This spot they covered with a cloth patch which to this day is worn on the wigs of male players of female roles.

The Takarazuka Cult

The Takarazuka Girls, however, are safe from public interference, on the contrary they are part of an institution which has a philanthropic character. The only risk is marriage and that in Japan is considered a good risk. Mr. Kobayashi gives the girls admitted to the so-called "opera" school an artistic opportunity which eventually will terminate unfavorably for him by the girls leaving the theater for the home.

The Tiller Girls school, founded a score of years ago in Manchester, England, is the Occidental model for Takarazuka. If Takarazuka goes much farther, the moral principles of the late Mr. Tiller and Mr. Kobayashi appear to be identical.

Anyone who has ever visited "Treasure Mounds," as the girls' school and home theater is so aptly named, knows that the several years' preliminary training progresses in nearly ideal surroundings. About an hour from Kyoto, Osaka or Kobe, in the high hills which provide inspiring vistas through the pines, is this amusement park called Takarazuka, which merits a better designation. For it lacks the characteristics which make most amusement parks unattractive to people of good taste.

The school is set a little way off from the section open to the public and reminds one of a good girls' school in the country of England or America. Perhaps it will prove to be the cradle for a new theater movement, not only for Japan, but also for the rest of the world.

U.S. Industries Ready For Wartime Basis

Domei

WASHINGTON, Dec. 12—Following the joint announcement Thursday by the War and Navy Departments of the projects for industrial mobilization in time of war, officials of the War Department here today disclosed that American industries could be converted on a wartime basis almost overnight.

The war plan divisions of both the Army and Navy have surveyed upwards 20,000 plants throughout the nation, it is reliably learned, recording the capital, number of employes and the productive capacity of the factories.

Secretary of War Harry L. Woodring in an official statement to the press declared that possession of such information would enable industry to avoid a lengthy period of "transition" from a peace-time to war-time footing. He emphasized that the present revision and modernization of the 1931 and 1933 industrial mobilization plans contained no "sinister" plans for making war.

French Vessel Launched; Keel For Another Laid

Domei

SAINT NAZAIRE, France, Dec. 12—The 26,500-ton Strasbourg, the second capital ship to be constructed by France since the World War was launched here today. The battleship is equipped with eight 13-inch guns, sixteen 5.1 inch guns, and 40 smaller guns. Specifications are similar to those of the Dunkerque launched in October of last year. She has a speed of 30 knots.

During the launching ceremonies, officiated by Navy Minister Gasnier Dupare, it was announced that the keel of the 35,000-ton battleship Jean Bart has already been laid down. Four light cruisers, the Marseillaise, Georges Leygues, Volta and Ouessant, which have been completed will soon be entered into active service.

Minister Dupare emphasized that more capital ships are necessary for the maintenance of France's sea strength.

Various Materials Used In Road Construction of rubber.

Rubber Cures Hardness

"Perhaps the most successful use of rubber for roads is its substitution for asphalt joints between sections of concrete. Two years' trial in New England indicates that rubber joints take up the expansion of concrete better than does asphalt, accumulate less water, and eliminate the rhythmic, over-the-waves bumping caused by projecting asphalt strips.

"Elsewhere roads are growing harder instead of more rubbery. Aluminum highways have provided Germany with smooth riding, with the added advantage of helping the light problem with their higher reflecting power. Powdered aluminum, mixed with the usual surfaces of tar or asphalt, prevents to some extent the softening of those substances during hot weather.

"A new Iron Age has been ushered in by Paris, where cast iron plates of different types have been laid along an avenue to test which kind is more durable. Already the iron plates are hailed as hardly more expensive than granite, and fifteen times as lasting as granite.

"The Province of Mysore, India, has sweetened the lot of the traveler by spreading molasses over its roads. Mixed with surface soil, molasses sheds rain and curbs dust.

Efforts to try new highway materials have developed unusual mixtures, such as soap with asphalt.

One process solidifies sand into solid ground by chemical treatment.

"Roads are made of whatever material is most plentiful in the neighborhood—oyster shells, crushed slate, crushed marble. West Virginia and Colorado have roads built of gold, or at least of material containing a low content of 'pay dirt.'

"A tin can road was provided in Georgia when an engineer dumped old tin cans on a road in construction, ran the steam roller over them, and packed sand and soil on top.

"Such unusual road surfaces are no stranger today than was the early macadamized covering, when the United States gave it a tryout on the old turnpike in Pennsylvania between Lancaster and Philadelphia. Concrete for a road, an idea that startled the country not forty years ago, was given a gingerly trial in Bellefontaine, Ohio—just one block. Now both surfacings are used extensively, as are asphalt, tar, stone, brick, wood, and gravel."

NY Plans Campaign To Fight Snowfall

Million Dollars Worth Of New Equipment Purchased; Unemployed Labor Conscripted

Mindful of last year's snow and ice blockades, New York City already is preparing for winter's blizzard under the reorganized Department of Sanitation, headed by William F. Carey. Prompted by Mayor F. H. LaGuardia, the Board of Aldermen has authorized $1,000,000 to buy new snow removal equipment. This appropriation was made after much discussion of Mr. Carey's request for $9,000,000 worth of equipment for year-around street cleaning, and $2,000,000 for snow removal.

Approximately two-thirds of the new snow equipment will be delivered by January 1, it is estimated, the city believing that the present facilities will be enough to cope with the comparatively light snowfalls of December. New York's worst winter weather comes after New Year's. One of the worst recent storms fell on January 19, 1936, with six inches of snow followed by days of near-zero temperature. Experts believe it may be several years before such adverse conditions recur, but the Department of Sanitation wants to be prepared.

Plows Clear First Passages

The first move after a snowfall is to clear a passage in the streets, for which the city has a variety of plows. The most effective units are twenty ponderous wreckers, used in ordinary weather for bringing in disabled trucks and sweepers.

The wreckers have steel plows with blades six feet high and twelve feet long to buck drifts, and surface ice-scrapers below. The department also has fifty-two rotary broom units for lighter snow deposits and 425 flushing machines to which plows can be added. The 926 collection trucks also carry plows. Between December 11 and February 15 the city will get 400 new trucks equipped with snow plows.

300 Small Units Ordered

As the plow-equipped units work up the main avenues, they pile drifts on the crossings. To clear them the city has 207 special plows, small and powerful, with 300 more ordered for this winter. It also has special road scrapers to remove the ice.

Speed in clearing the streets after the plows have cut traffic lanes is important. If the temperature is well above freezing, water can be used to a limited extent in melting snow masses. But conditions rarely are favorable for such an easy solution.

Ordinarily the snow must be piled and then carted to a riverfront. This seasonal occupation long has been a winter boon for the needy.

Mechanical loaders also are used to load the carts. The city now has 127 of the escalator or endless chain type, and has contracted for 111 new loaders.

Mayor LaGuardia and the Board of Aldermen were long at loggerheads as to what kind of loaders to get. The appropriation was finally split to buy sixty-eight of the escalator kind, as the Aldermen prefer, and forty-three of the more rotary variety that the Mayor favors. This latter type has revolving blades which draw up the snow and pour it through a swanlike neck into the carts, says the New York Herald Tribune. Even with the 238 loaders, old and new, the department maintains that the city will not be prepared for good resistance to the elements until it gets all the apparatus it proposed.

Civil Service Labor

There will be an improvement in the extra labor to be recruited for snow removal. From the civil service lists have been selected 2,442 truck drivers from twenty-one to thirty-one years old, who will be called when the first heavy fall comes. This is the first time the civil service will supply snow removal labor. The drivers are undergoing tests on their ability to drive under emergency conditions.

For shoveling labor the department has registered 20,445 men from twenty-one to fifty years old. The registration took place at 226 stations throughout the city with the cooperation of welfare, charitable and relief agencies. Only those were accepted who seemed strong enough to stand up under the work and the weather. On each registration card is a small photograph of the registrant, a duplicate of which is on file to prevent transfer of the cards.

efficient for the purpose. A new type of gas 'transmission line' was developed which gives the impulse method of ion acceleration considerable promise.

"Incidentally, the study of the bove gas 'transmission line' has afforded a possible insight into the mechanism for the propogation of he lightning flash."

New Tests for Earth's Age

Further refinements in methods for determining the age of the earth which promise for the first time to establish reasonably accurate dates for the various geological periods were reported by Dr. Alfred C. Lane, Emeritus Professor of Geology at Tufts College, Boston.

Much progress has been made recently in studies of the earth's age by determination of the rate of decay of the radioactive rocks containing uranium and radium, and their disintegration products, consisting of a special type of lead and of helium gas. Uranium and radium disintegrate at a definite rate which has been found to be constant under conditions.

But whereas uranium has a half-life time of 4,500,000,000 years, radium has a half-life time of only 1,700 years.

"If you have a definite quantity of popcorn," Dr. Lane stated, "and you know the rate at which they pop, you could tell by counting the kernels that have not yet popped how long the popping process has been going on. Similarly, you can determine the age of the earth by determining the amount of uranium that is still left and comparing it with the amount of the special form of lead into which the uranium has disintegrated."

Since it takes uranium 4,500,000,000 years to disintegrate to half its original amount, Dr. Lane stated, the finding of an equal amount of lead with the uranium would indicate that the earth was 4,500,000,000 years old. Actually, it is found that only two-tenths of the uranium has disintegrated into lead. The shows that the earth is about 2,000,000,000 years old.

Helium Gas From Radium

Radium, on the other hand, gives off helium gas, as it turns into lead. In rocks not too close to the surface this gas is retained. With the rate of disintegration known and compared with the amount of helium gas found, the age of the rocks can be determined.

The older rocks have more helium than the younger, whereas the amount of radium in the older is not much different from that in the younger rocks. By measurement of the difference in helium content, the difference in age between the older and younger rocks may be determined.

By applying this method, Dr. W. D. Urry of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology has determined the age of certain rocks at 1,090,000,000 years.

A new mathematical theory of chemical reactions, which attempts to explain the reason why certain chemical elements combine with one another to form the infinite number of chemical compounds in nature and in the laboratory, was presented by Dr. Henry Eyring, Associate Professor of Chemistry at Princeton University.

By figuring out the distances separating the various atoms and their energy levels it becomes possible in some instances to predict how they will behave. Extension of the work, it is hoped, will make it possible for the chemist to figure out by mathematics how to produce new compounds and how to reproduce synthetically in the laboratory essential compounds existing in nature.

The work, however, is still in an early preliminary stage.

A new apparatus for the concentration of "heavy carbon," which has an atomic weight of thirteen instead of the twelve of ordinary carbon, was reported by Professor Harold C. Urey of Columbia University, who won the Nobel Prize in Chemistry for his discovery of "heavy hydrogen," with an atomic weight twice that of ordinary hydrogen.

Concentration of the heavy carbon is a very difficult process, Dr. Urey explained, but with improvement in the apparatus it is hoped to produce amounts a thousand times greater than that obtained by present methods.

Social and Personal Notes

RETURN TO JAPAN

Mr. and Mrs. Roger Burnam, who have been in the United States for several months, returned to Tokyo today by the Empress of Canada.

ENTERTAIN AT EGG-NOG PARTY

Mr. and Mrs. A. R. Boyce entertained a large number of friends Friday at an egg-nog party at their home at 6 Hinoki-cho, Akasaka-ku.

NOW IN TOKYO

Captain C. R. Boxer, who was a language student at the British Embassy several years ago, is now in Tokyo on his way to Hongkong. He is spending a few days as the guest of the Dutch Minister, General J. C. Pabst.

Captain Boxer is a student of Dutch and the author of the book Jan Compagnie in Japan, which deals with the Dutch activities during the early Tokugawa Period. Captain Boxer is travelling with his sister who is also staying at the Dutch Legation.

YOKOHAMA NEW STREET CARS

The Yokohama Municipal Electric Bureau recently built five large modern street cars for the accommodation and comfort of the passengers. Inside the car there are six cushioned chairs to accommodate 12 persons. On the other side of the car there is a long seat running the length of the car. The accommodation limit of each car is 95. These cars are to be tentatively placed on the lines in Yokohama from January 1.

RETURNED TO JAPAN

Mr. Geoffrey Oram of the Rising Sun Petroleum Company, Yokohama returned to Japan from a six months' trip in England today by the Empress of Canada.

DESCRIPTIVE BROCHURE ON VIEW

The British consulate has on view a descriptive brochure issued by the London Times containing a small facsimile of the painting by Frank O. Salisbury of the Jubilee service in St. Paul's Cathedral entitled The Heart of the Empire, which the late King George V wished to have reproduced in colors and sold for the benefit of King George's Trust Fund

YOKOHAMA A. D. C. TO GIVE PLAY

Whimsy Shows Under Troubles In Poe's Letters

to try and borrow $3—so that I may have a fortnight to go upon. I feel in excellent spirits and haven't drank a drop so that I hope—to get out of trouble. The very instant I scrape together enough money I will send it on" . . .

Another to Mrs. Clemm, whom he affectionately called "Muddy";

. . . "I lectured at Norfolk on Monday and cleared enough to settle my bill here at the Madison House (Richmond, Va) with $2 over. I had a highly fashionable audience but Norfolk is a small place and there were 2 exhibitions the same night." . . .

Apologies for Some Drinks

The whimsical touch becomes apparent particularly in a letter Poe wrote from Philadelphia to two friends. When last he had seen them, Poe evidently had indulged too freely. He wrote:

". . . please express my regret to Mr. Fuller for making such a fool of myself in his house, and say to him (if you think necessary) that I should not have got half so drunk on his excellent port wine but for the rummy coffee with which I was forced to wash it down." . . .

A puzzling bit of the collection is a Valentine poem, written in 1846 and signed "E. A. P." Library officials believed the poem never had been published. It reads:

"For her these lines are penned, whose luminous eyes,
Bright and expressive as the stars of Leda,
Shall find her own sweet name that, nestling lies
Upon this page, enwrapped from every reader.
Search narrowly these words, which hold a treasure
Divine—a talisman, an amulet
That must be worn at heart. Search well the measure—
The words—the letters themselves. Do not forget
The smallest point, or you may lose your labor,
And yet there is in this no Gordian knot
Which one might not undo without a sabre
If one could merely understand the plot.
Upon the open page on which are peering
Such sweet eyes now, there lies, I say, Pardu,
A musical name oft uttered in the bearing
Of poets, by poets—for the name is a poet's too.
In common sequence set, the letters lying,
Compose a sound delighting all to hear—
Ah, this you'd have no trouble in descrying
Were you not something of a dunce, my dear—
And now I leave these riddles to their seer."

The hidden name Frances Sergeant Osgood, one of Poe's contemporaries, says the New York Herald Tribune, is revealed by taking the first letter in the first line, the second letter in the second line, and so on through the twenty-one lines.

Devaluation Aids Swiss Business

even lowering, of the present level. With a quick appreciation of the needs of the hour, the Federal Council decided to render far more supple the existing regime of restrictions. Certain quotas must be abolished, and certain tariffs cut. These measures have a regulating effect on the economy of the country, and it is hoped that there will be stability of prices and wages. The benefits of a momentary speculation in acquired stocks would be nothing compared to the permanent benefits to be deriyed from the new stimulus to trade. Happily, even those who have not given much thought to economics realized the need of co-operating, and it would seem that the transition from the old to the new franc has been accomplished without undue difficulty.

Benefits Accruing

Each class of the population has seen where its true interest lies. The shopkeeper has seen that it is not in higher prices but in larger sales. The manufacturer has seen the opportunity of selling abroad again. The hotel keeper is anxious to welcome the visitor in greater numbers. The workman understands that a sudden rise in wages, which would mean a corresponding rise in prices, would not enable him to purchase more, and would leave the problem of unemployment where it is today, whereas an acceptance of the new conditions should mean a massive decrease of unemployment.

So that those who refused to envisage the possibility of devaluation, instead of indulging in idle criticism when it was decreed, rallied round the Government in order to make the most of the opportunities of economic recovery of which Switzerland, as much as any country in Europe, stands in need.

Reich Decree Bans All Art Criticism

Writers Hereafter Will Not Blame Or Praise, But Merely Give Description Of Work

Dr. Joseph Goebbels, Propaganda Minister, announced on November 27 that in future all criticism of the drama, films, literature, painting, sculpture and other art works would be prohibited. The ruling applies primarily to published criticism but evidently it applies also to the radio and the platform, says the New York Times.

Writers are neither to praise nor blame. They are not to express any opinions. Their sole duty is to give a "description" of the work with which they are dealing.

This decision, announced at the annual festival sitting of the Reich Cultural Chamber, is the upshot of a long quarrel between the National Socialist regime and the dramatic, film and art critics, the last of the German journalists and publicists who occasionally expressed opinions contrary to those of responsible National Socialist functionaries.

Dr. Goebbels, in opening his address, said;

"I do not intend this year to report the details of the Reich Cultural Chamber's work in order to demonstrate the unhalting victory march of our cultural life. Our steady progress is so clear to every man that it hardly needs comment.

All Efforts Have Failed

Professional observers of this program, however, appear to have been of a different opinion. Even in the National Socialist press they have often been damned with faint praise.

"These conceited know-it-all gentlemen," Dr. Goebbels said today, "who, through their everlasting quarreling constitute an off-chorus in our cultural and artistic life are merely heirs of the Jewish critics' autocracy.

"We employed every means to bring the critics to their sole and proper role of art observation, giving them with it the possibility of continued existence. All these efforts have failed. It sometimes looked as if all the scolds who could no longer exercise their faculties in other fields centered on the arts.

"We had to call a halt. I therefore found it necessary in the decree announced today to forbid all criticism and replace it with art observation or art description. That does not mean the limitation of free expression of opinion.
